

September 7, 2022

By Stephen Wallis | Photography By Andre D. Wagner for WSJ. Magazine

Hank Willis Thomas Sees His Art as a Call to “Loving Action”

With a major new show, the artist continues to confront today's most divisive issues—violence, racism, polarization—in hopes of inspiring mutual understanding and positive solutions.

Artist Hank Willis Thomas at his Brooklyn studio. His show “Everything We See Hides Another Thing” opens September 8 at Jack Shainman Gallery in New York City.

Throughout the summer, drivers on Long Island’s Route 27 between Southampton and Water Mill have been passing the words “Remember Me” emblazoned in large neon script across the side of the Parrish Art Museum. A yearlong installation by the artist Hank Willis Thomas, those two words radiate with a sense of profound, if uncertain, meaning. Are they a plea? A provocation? An exhortation?

Maybe the answer is all of those things and more, suggests the Brooklyn-based Thomas, 46, who spends a lot of time thinking about the potency and relative truth of words, symbols, gestures and images. The source material for the Parrish piece was an old postcard with a picture of a young rifle-carrying Black man in a hat worn by the 19th-century U.S. cavalry regiments known as the Buffalo Soldiers. “Remember me” was scrawled on the back. The fact that the phrase was handwritten “personifies it, activates it,” says Thomas. “We all want to be acknowledged and remembered.”

Remembering, in many ways, is the core of Thomas’s art. Trained as a photographer, he has spent much of his career mining advertising, sports and pop culture images as well as documentary photos of protest, especially from the Civil Rights era. By incorporating these images into his work, Thomas reframes often overlooked historical narratives and highlights their intersections with contemporary issues of race, freedom and justice.

“In these extremely fractured times, Hank Willis Thomas is an invaluable convener of people and ideas, with a genuine desire to connect and foster dialogue, always with an eye to a path forward,” says Parrish curator Corinne Erni, who oversaw Thomas’s facade commission. She also worked with him to organize Another Justice: US Is Them, on view at the museum through early November. The exhibition features works by Thomas and 11 of his collaborators in the For Freedoms initiative, which he co-founded in 2016. A forum for artists to participate in public discourse, For Freedoms continues to expand its outreach and mission, which has extra resonance in this midterm season.

The flash version of the 2021 piece “Freedom Riders on Colors for a Large Wall,” left, next to a falling-figure retroreflective work.

In addition to the Parrish exhibition, Thomas’s New York gallerist, Jack Shainman, is turning over both of his Chelsea spaces to a show of recent work, opening September 8, and the artist is finishing multiple public art projects, including a memorial on Boston Common to Martin Luther King Jr. and Coretta Scott King.

“What I love about his work is, on the one hand, it punches you in the gut, and on the other hand, it’s very forward-thinking,” says Shainman, who has worked with Thomas for nearly 20 years. “Hank is an optimist, I do believe.”

That optimism is reflected in the artist’s sculpture for the King memorial, The Embrace, a 20-foot-high circular bronze that depicts the Kings’ arms intertwined, based on a detail from a photograph of the couple embracing after he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1964. The monument is slated to be officially unveiled in January 2023, on Martin Luther King Jr. Day.

Models and 3-D prints for various works, along with the stainless-steel sculpture “Everything We See Hides Another Thing” (2021) and a small bronze model for “The Embrace.” The backdrop is part of “Out (Blue)” (2022), made from old prison uniforms.

Created with MASS Design Group, Thomas's frequent collaborators, the memorial is literal and specific in its references—honoring the Kings' commitment to their social justice work and to each other—but at the same time, the gesture is abstract and universal. "Not everyone can hug, but I'm pretty sure everyone has been hugged," says Thomas. The design encourages visitors to walk into the center of the memorial, where an oculus opens to the sky above, "and they will be in the heart of the embrace," the artist says. He likes to imagine the work as "the largest monument to love in the United States of America."

Composed of some 600 pieces that were first 3-D printed before being cast in bronze, The Embrace is being fabricated at the Walla Walla Foundry in Washington state, where it will be welded into five segments and shipped across the country. The granite plaza beneath it will take the form of a labyrinth, or peace walk, designed with elements of African-American quilt patterns as well as plaques inscribed with the names of 65 local Civil Rights activists, all of whom participated in the Kings' 20,000-strong march from Roxbury to Boston Common in 1965.

"Our proposal was to say, hey, what if we make this plaza its own memorial...to the '65 march and elevate some of the unsung heroes of that period, the foot soldiers, the people locally who fought for economic and social justice," says MASS Design founder and executive director Michael Murphy. "This could be a catalyst for something bigger and not just something frozen in time, not just one story, but the beginning of hundreds of stories that we have yet to fully find out." Murphy, who also worked with Thomas on the Gun Violence Memorial Project currently at the National Building Museum in Washington, D.C., adds that "one of Hank's strengths is not just understanding how to tell stories but also demanding that we ask of those stories something greater than ourselves."

"What I love about his work is, on the one hand, it punches you in the gut, and on the other hand, it's very forward-thinking."

— Jack Shainman

A five-foot-high version of The Embrace is included in the Shainman show, which is on view through the end of October, alongside several other sculptures and some of Thomas's largest so-called retroreflectives to date. Printed on retroreflective vinyl, these works feature photographs—mostly historical—overlaid with washes of color, graphic patterns or painterly marks that partially obscure the primary image. Thomas plays with the fact that retroreflective surfaces appear most clearly in bright light. (Think car headlights on a stop sign.) What observers can see shifts as they move around the work, with the latent image only fully revealed by using a phone's camera flash or flashlight held near one's chin.

"Part of what I'm fascinated by with this work is that the viewer is constantly aware of their positioning and their orientation towards what they're looking at," says Thomas. "There's a lot of passive viewing in photography, but in this case, the viewer becomes a photographer in a sense, using flash photography to actually make the picture."

Some of the new retroreflectives combine Civil Rights protest images with references to celebrated artists of the era. In one, portraits of Freedom Riders emerge from the squares of an Ellsworth Kelly-style color grid. Another features a photo of Malcolm X beneath a re-creation of Roy Lichtenstein's Mirror #2 (Six Panels), a work that was itself playing with visual representation and illusion. "I'm thinking a lot about these masters of art who figured out visual language graphically but have often left content wanting to be implemented," says Thomas. "I've tried in my own way to take content that I was interested in and mixing that into these."

Thomas also explores more recent politically charged imagery, superimposing a TV color bar pattern on a photo of the January 6 riots at the Capitol. He notes that without context, isolated images from that day can be hard to distinguish from other historical protests. "I've been fascinated with this concept of what gets people out of their houses to come together for something that they believe," he says, "carrying symbols and signs to let the world know that they want to be seen."

Most of Thomas's new sculptures in bronze and stainless steel continue his exploration of gesture, depicting arms and hands variously clasping, grasping, reaching or, in one case, giving a peace sign. That work, titled Duality, is something of a corollary to his well-known sculpture Unity, a 22-foot bronze arm with the index finger pointing skyward that was permanently installed at the foot of the Brooklyn Bridge in 2019.

. Thomas with a model of "The Embrace," a sculpture memorializing Martin Luther King Jr. and Coretta Scott King.

The show at Shainman also includes a small-scale version of a commission Thomas created in collaboration with artist Coby Kennedy for Chicago O'Hare International Airport. The 49.5-foot-long work, Reach, features a pair of arms extending toward each other, their hands about to touch. It will be installed in the airport's parking and car rental center. "The desire to connect with another is definitely a running theme," Thomas says.

Perhaps no body of work is more personal to the artist than his series Falling Stars, which was inspired by the death of his cousin Songha Willis, a close friend and mentor who was killed in a shooting in 2000. Oversize flags embroidered with thousands of stars—one for every person murdered by guns in the U.S. in a particular year—are hung from a wall, cascading onto the floor below. The three in the current show represent 2018 (14,916 deaths), 2019 (15,433) and 2021 (20,923).

"We have computer chips that can connect us with everyone across the world, but we can't stop killing each other. That's probably a crisis of imagination, and that's where I think art plays a role," says Thomas. "Say what you want about the power or impact of art at a gallery, but it is part of my attempt to bear witness, to call into loving action, and also to look sternly at who we are and ask the question of what do we truly represent?"

Ask Thomas for his take on the grim mood in the U.S., with polls indicating that a majority of Americans, regardless of political affiliation, believe things are heading in the wrong direction, and he doesn't hesitate. "The polls don't ask the important follow-up question, which is, What are you going to do about it?" he says. "Are you going to keep demonizing people who you disagree with? Are you going to just huddle and try to protect your little version of your safe community, or are you going to actually try to become an active participant in enhancing the things that you care about?"

ArtSeen

Hank Willis Thomas & For Freedoms: Another Justice: US is Them

By Joyce Beckenstein

Hank Willis Thomas, Remember Me (Amérique Forms in Space), 2022. UV print on retroreflective vinyl, 63 x 46 inches. Courtesy the Artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York. Photo: Gary Mamay.

In 1943, the painter-illustrator Norman Rockwell created a series of paintings to illustrate the aspirational “Four Freedoms” defined by President Franklin D. Roosevelt in his 1941 State of the Union Address: freedom of speech and of worship; freedom from want and from fear. Rockwell’s painting, Freedom from Want (1943), today referred to as the “Rockwell Thanksgiving,” portrays a stereotypical gathering of smiley white kin gathered around a table set with fine linen, china, silver, and a succulent turkey. There is no want. Fast forward to 2016, when a coalition of artists, academics, and organizers, including Hank Willis Thomas, founded the organization For Freedoms, the title riffing on Rockwell's mid-twentieth century portrayals of mostly white entitlements. For Freedoms aspires to engage the arts as a means of helping people reconsider how we as a people view and mete out justice. It's a huge sweeping mission, but one that the exhibition, Another Justice: US is Them—Hank Willis Thomas & For Freedoms (US refers to the United States) manages to distill to intimate size and scale.

The twelve artists in this show summon humor, irony, and sensitivity to encourage viewers to rethink the self-serving interpretations of American justice that have so unjustly reigned throughout our history. They do so by quietly tapping into personal perspectives and cultural prejudices, their messaging more oblique than explicit. There is, for example, a 55-foot neon sculpture reading "Remember Me" spanning the museum's exterior southern wall. The signage sends an enigmatic message to drivers-by who, if they visit the exhibition, will learn that these words and script replicate a handwritten note on the back of a vintage WWI postcard. The postcard bears the portrait of a Black soldier holding a rifle and sporting an American flag on a hat associated with the Buffalo Soldiers—a Black cavalry US Army regiment begun in 1866. Thomas immortalizes this otherwise anonymous soldier by transferring the postcard photograph onto a UV print, titled Remember Me (Amérique Forms in Space) (2022), one of several multi-media "flags" by Thomas featured in this exhibition. Each flag deconstructs the iconic American banner we more typically see waving in the breeze:

In Freedom (2021), Thomas reconfigures the flag's horizontal red and white stripes into a labyrinth that spells out the word "Freedom"; in Imaginary Lines (2021), a progression of vertical red and white stripes suggest prison bars. As these works conflate the American flag with symbols of confinement and anonymity, so do they expand the meaning of the refrain "Remember Me," letting it refer to the hopeless fate of incarcerated prisoners, most of them people of color.

Kambui Olujimi also deals with the way America's racially disproportionate incarceration rate marginalizes the magnitude of white responsibility for violent crime. He upends the whitewash in a moving series of monochromatic ink drawings titled "Redshift" (2018). These depict the likenesses of white Americans—John Wilkes Booth, Lee Harvey Oswald, and John Hinckley Jr. among them—who with some success sought to assassinate American Presidents. Exhibition curator Corinne Erni intersperses these assassin portraits with Olujimi's more recent renderings of the January 6, 2021 insurrection, and with his portraits of Republican election deniers advocating the overturn of the 2020 election. Like Thomas's flags, Olujimi's minimalist imagery effectively damns a tradition of media coverage that consistently diminishes white responsibility for crime and violence.

Zoë Buckman and Joiiri Minaya deal with gender injustice, both artists choosing fabric to metaphorically merge medium and meaning. Referencing “women’s work,” as well as conflicting perceptions of female fragility, vulnerability, and vengeance, Buckman embroiders on delicate vintage fabrics, foils for the sharp sting of a needle piercing fabric, something we viscerally feel in works such as Rose’s boat (2022), a self-portrait sewn on a lace doily. Buckman’s scraggly threads of “hair” seem pulled from the surface, her eyelashes and facial lines aggressively stitched. Meanwhile, Minaya’s Away from Prying Eyes (2020) grapples with the eroticization of the Caribbean female body, equating the hot, lush, and untamed jungle with female sexuality. Minaya’s photographs chronicle performances in which she dons a landscape-patterned bodysuit and then struggles to escape from it. This shedding of her superimposed “skin,” photographed against a background of tropical floral wallpaper, expresses her determination to liberate herself from an ethnocentric idealization of femininity.

US is Them literally homes in on the theme of injustice as an endemic condition rooted in early American history. Just a casual stroll around the open windswept fields of The Parrish Art Museum reminds us that this building, like most all East End, Long Island architecture, whether public or private, sits on land stolen from Indigenous people by white seventeenth century settlers. The exhibit activates this history with a series of digital posters intermittently flashing on one of a pair of controversial six-story illuminated advertising billboards, monuments that the Shinnecock Indian Nation erected in 2019 on a small remaining patch of their land. These enormous towers flank the east and west lanes of Sunrise Highway, the main conduit through a string of upscale Hampton hamlets that runs past the famed Shinnecock Golf Course, a site built over ancient Indigenous burial grounds. Many consider the monuments’ size, design, and continuous beaming of commercial advertising—an important source of revenue for the Nation—as “out of character” with the Hamptons’ aesthetic.

Though a thread of poetic justice runs through the Nation’s successful perseverance during this controversy, a more significant triumph lies in the collaboration between the museum and the For Freedoms Landback Public Art Initiative. Four artists—Jeremy Dennis, Jeffrey Gibson, Koyoltzintli Miranda-Rivadeneira, and Marie Watt—have each created a digital poster supportive of the rights of Indigenous people, now displayed on a Shinnecock billboard. It is this kind of partnership that affirms the power of art to raise our consciousness as we reflect on our perceptions of justice.

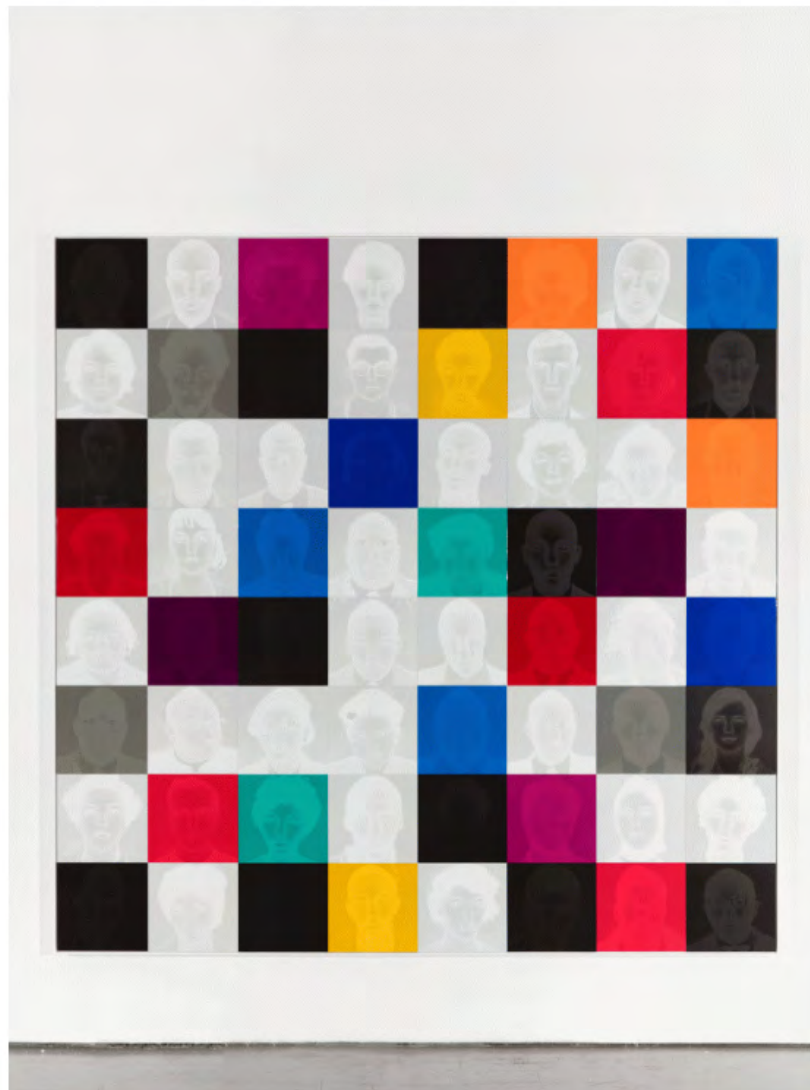

Galleries

13 Buzzy Back-to-School Gallery Shows to See During Armory Week, From a Red-Hot Group Show to Rick Lowe's Gagosian Debut

It's "back to school" for the art world—here's a guide to the best openings on tap this week.

Sarah Cascone, September 6, 2022

"Hank Willis Thomas: Everything We See Hides Another Thing" at Jack Shainman Gallery

In his latest outing, Hank Willis Thomas presents a selection of large-scale sculptures, mixed-media textile works, and his unique retroreflective prints, their latent imagery activated by the flash of your cell phone camera. The show also features Thomas's ongoing "Falling Stars" series, of massive blue flags featuring one embroidered star for every U.S. death from gun violence in a year—14,916 in 2018, 15,433 in 2019, and 20,923 in 2021.

On view at Jack Shainman Gallery, 513 West 20th Street and 524 West 24th Street, September 8–October 29, 2022; opening reception, 6 p.m.–8 p.m.

THE ART NEWSPAPER

Marvin Gaye-inspired exhibition to inaugurate Rubell Museum in Washington, DC

The exhibition will feature nearly 200 works from Don and Mera Rubell's collection

Hank Willis Thomas, from the Unbranded Series B, A Natural Explosion! Afro Sheen® Blowout Creme Relaxer (1973/2007).
Courtesy Rubell Museum.

THE ART NEWSPAPER

The forthcoming Rubell Museum will inaugurate its long-awaited outpost in the US capital next month with a sprawling exhibition focused on topical political and sociopolitical discourse.

The exhibition What's Going On includes nearly 200 works by an eclectic mix of around 40 well-known contemporary artists from the collection of the Miami-based art collectors Don and Mera Rubell, from Carrie Mae Weems and Hank Willis Thomas to Maurizio Cattelan and Richard Prince.

The title of the show references Marvin Gaye's seminal 1971 album of the same name and its anthemic titular single, which decried injustice and other social ills. Gaye was a student at the long-closed Randall Junior High School, which has been converted by the New York-based firm Beyer Blinder Belle Architects to house the new museum.

A centrepiece of the exhibition is Keith Haring's Untitled (Against All Odds) (1989)—a series of 20 ink and gouache drawings Haring said he completed in one day while listening to music by Gaye and Bob Marley. Made shortly before Haring died from Aids-related complications in February 1990, central themes of the series include environmental destruction, war, oppression and discrimination.

THE ART NEWSPAPER

The Rubells, who are known to work closely with the artists in their collection, hold a significant number of works by Haring. An expansive exhibition titled after the same series was held at their former space in Miami between 2005 and 2006, and Haring's work is often prominently featured in their new Miami complex's galleries.

The 32,000 sq. ft Washington, DC complex will open to the public on 29 October. Last month, it was announced that the former art dealer Caitlin Berry was appointed the director of the museum.

The Rubells hold a collection of more than 7,000 contemporary artworks. The couple opened the Rubell Family Collection in 1993 in the Wynwood neighbourhood of Miami and relocated to Allapattah in 2019 in an Annabelle Selldorf-designed space.

EYE CANDY

A Visual Appreciation of Fine Artists Appropriating Commercial Photography

by Stephanie Eckardt
09.05.22

W

*T*he Los Angeles County Museum of Art didn't have to look too deep into its collection to find source material for "Objects of Desire: Photography and the Language of Advertising." The degree to which artists have appropriated advertising techniques to further agendas of their own—since the 1970s in particular—is so prominent that the bulk of the works on view through December 18 come from within the institution itself. Featuring 34 artists such as Barbara Kruger, Hank Willis Thomas, Sara Cwynar, and Roe Ethridge, the Rebecca Morse-curated exhibition highlights what she describes as an "under-recognized" relationship between commercial and fine art photography. And indeed, while we're all aware of how Andy Warhol carried what he learned as an ad illustrator over to his fine art practice, you may be surprised by how many have manipulated the visual codes of capitalist marketing to their advantage in the decades since.

Divided into five categories—Stock Photography, Product and Color Photography, Image and Text, The Magazine, and Humor—the show breaks down the many ways in which the aforementioned overlap has manifested in recent memory. There are excerpts from series like Hank Willis Thomas's "Fair Warning," which reimagines old cigarette ads, and Sandy Skoglund's "Food Still Lives," which turns imagery from commercials of yore into spotlights of the anti-fascist Yugoslavian women who fought against the Nazis. And if you're familiar with Sarah Charlesworth, it'll come as no surprise that the late artist is among those whose work is featured: "Objects of Desire" was also the title of the seminal posthumous '80s series that made it clear why she was just as key to the Pictures Movement as names like Cindy Sherman.

A can't-miss kickoff to this fall's packed arts season, take a look inside "Objects of Desire," newly on view at LACMA, here.

W

Hank Willis Thomas, Believe It, 2010.

HYPERALLERGIC

Art Previews

Hyperallergic Fall 2022 New York Art Guide

A month-by-month visual guide to the museum exhibitions and art events you should check out in New York City this season.

by Hyperallergic August 31, 2022

New York City continues to be a global hub of culture, and nowhere is that energy and vitality as evident as in the city's vibrant art scene, which includes dozens of museums, hundreds of art galleries, countless nonprofit spaces and temporary venues, and a cornucopia of public art.

Contemporary art is in the DNA of this city, and it is where Pop Art, Minimalism, graffiti, digital art, and so many other influential styles and movements got their start, eventually going on to have a major impact on global culture.

To understand the real beauty of New York, look no further than its inclusiveness. There is something for everyone in this great metropolis. My suggestion is to go out and see it all!

HYPERALLERGIC

Why not take a stroll in Central Park and check out the beautiful fountains, bridges, and public art projects throughout, or visit the commercial art galleries of Chelsea, Tribeca, or the Lower East Side to see some work by emerging and established artists on display? Or better yet, check out the wealth of museums the city has to offer.

This guide is focused on the art institutions that help make this city great, and it highlights the breadth of venues throughout the boroughs, as well as a few beyond in the Greater New York region for those adventurous enough to go on a day trip. Art in New York is truly unlike anything else in the world.

— Hrag Vartanian, editor-in-chief

HYPERALLERGIC

Hank Willis Thomas, "Remember Me" (2022) in Another Justice: US is Them at the Parrish Art Museum, white neon with black painted front, 95 x 624 ½ inches (© Hank Willis Thomas, photo by Gary Mamay, courtesy the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York)

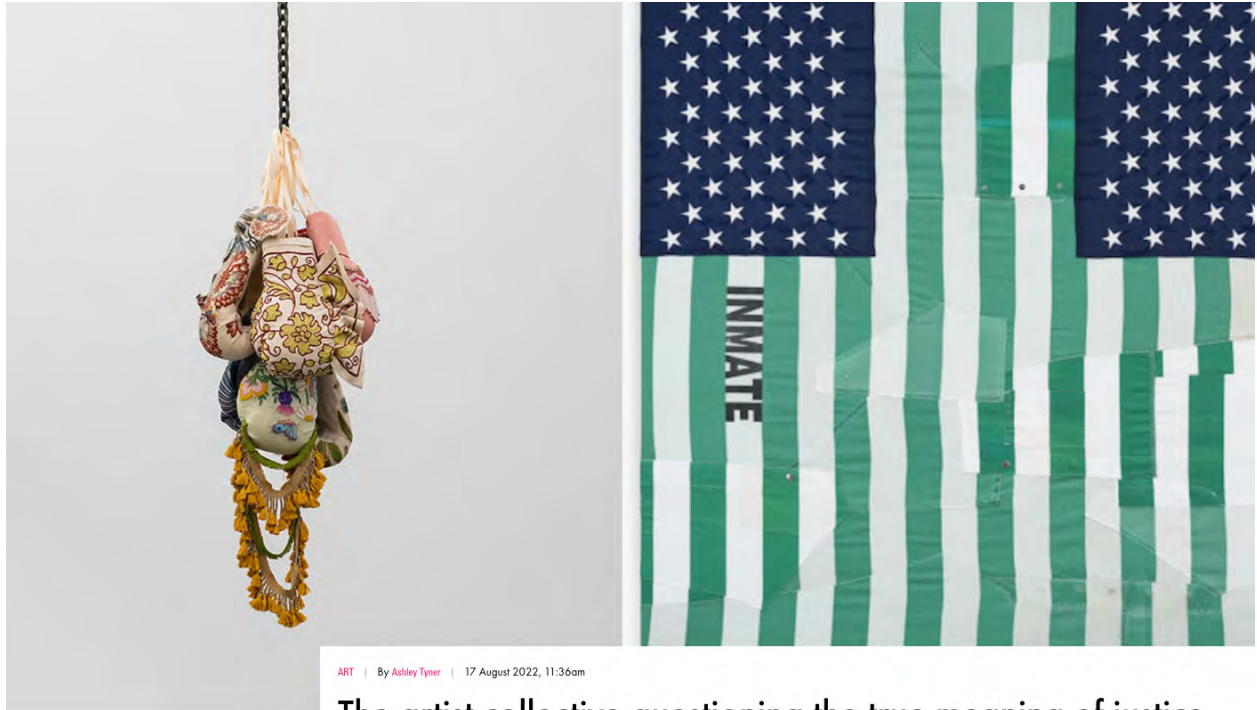

Another Justice: US is Them

"Remember Me," urges a sweeping neon by Hank Willis Thomas affixed to the Long Island museum's exterior. The exhibition continues inside with work by artists involved with For Freedoms, a nonprofit co-founded by Thomas to foster civic engagement.

Parrish Art Museum (parrishart.org)

279 Montauk Highway, Water Mill, New York

Through November 6

The artist collective questioning the true meaning of justice

A show at The Parrish Art Museum, curated by Hank Willis Thomas and For Freedoms, features poignant works by artists meditating on liberation.

“Freedom of speech, freedom of worship, the freedom from want and the freedom from fear.” These are the four freedoms President Franklin D. Roosevelt outlined in his historical 1941 State of the Union Address, as the United States prepared to aid Britain in a second World War that was steadily unfolding. For the Saturday Evening Post, artist Norman Rockwell interpreted the speech with a series of paintings showing everyday Americans embodying liberation.

Seventy years later, with that dream so far from reality for so many in the US, artists Hank Willis Thomas, Eric Gottesman, Michelle Woo and Wyatt Gallery have formed an artist collective called For Freedoms, an art-led civic organization “that centers art and creativity as a catalyst for transformative connection and collective liberation.” Their interpretation of Roosevelt’s vision outlines “justice, listening, healing and awakening” as the freedoms demanded by our modern social and political climate.

For Freedom’s latest offering is an exhibition at The Parrish Art Museum in Water Mill, New York, titled Another Justice: US is Them. Curated by Hank Willis Thomas, it runs through November 6th. Last week, the museum partnered with global arts club The Cultivist and Chantecaille for an afternoon tour, inviting viewers to meditate on what justice must look like in this time of upheaval. It was led by Zoe Buckman, one of the featured artists whose work is shown alongside Hank, Pamela Council, Jeremy Dennis, Jeffery Gibson, Eric Gottesman,

i-D

Christine Sun Kim, Muna Malik, Joiiri Minaya, Koyoltzintli Miranda-Rivadeneira, Kambul Olujimi and Marie Watt.

HANK WILLIS THOMAS, "A NEW CONSTELLATION," 2021

HANK WILLIS THOMAS, "REMEMBER ME (AMÉRIQUE FORMS IN SPACE)," 2022.

i-D

Part of a larger campaign by For Freedoms called 'Another Justice: By Any Medium Necessary,' the show spans both the Parrish galleries, and the museum grounds — showcasing a piece of Hank's installed on the side of the building that reads 'Remember Me' in bold neon lights.

Within the galleries, highlights include Zoe's embroidery work complicating feminism and sexual violence, Kambul's watercolors of presidential assassins, textile works by Hank that reimagine the American flag, Christine's wall paintings uplifting American Sign Language and sculptures by Pamela exploring her family ancestry.

The Indigenous artists of the group collaborated on a series of 62-foot digital billboards on the Shinnecock Monuments on Sunrise Highway, which also serve as an extension of the show. Most of these works were created for the exhibition, and all of these artists will be participating in a residency at the nearby Watermill Center, aligned with public programming and town halls with local community members around justice and equity. Their main aim is to actively bring the show's message out into the community.

Robb Report

SHELTER / ART & COLLECTIBLES

JULY 23, 2022

Artist Hank Willis Thomas Co-Curates a New Show Exploring the Fraying Fabric of America

On display this Saturday at the Parrish Art Museum, the show includes sculptures, paintings and photographs.

By JULIE BELCOVE

Jeff Vespa

Back in 2016, as the country's political divide cratered into an abyss against the backdrop of a bitter presidential contest, a quartet of art-world friends came together to found For Freedoms. Playing on Franklin Delano Roosevelt's famed "Four Freedoms" speech and Norman Rockwell's subsequent series of oil paintings celebrating the freedoms of speech and worship and freedoms from want and fear, the collective sought to promote more civic—and civil—engagement via art.

For Freedoms continued its mission through another election cycle, and now one of the founders, conceptual artist Hank Willis Thomas, has co-curated Another Justice: US Is Them, an exhibition at the Parrish Art Museum in Water Mill, NY, on view until November 6. "We believe artists often are on the forefront of critical thought in our society and are the ones who introduce us to ideas and concepts that we might otherwise be averse to," Thomas says. "This exhibition is just the beginning of that conversation. We say good art asks questions and good design answers them, and the quality of questions dictates the quality of the answers.”

Robb Report

An installation view of Hank Willis Thomas's Remember Me, 2020, white neon with black painted front
Courtesy of the Artist/Jack Shainman Gallery/Photo by Gary Mamay

The artworks span from sculptures and paintings to prints and photographs, and the exhibition even extends beyond the Parrish campus to the Shinnecock Monuments, 62-foot-tall electronic billboards owned by the Shinnecock Indian Nation on its ancestral land along what is now Sunrise Highway, where the work of several Indigenous artists, including Jeremy Dennis, Jeffrey Gibson, Koyoltzintli Miranda-Rivadeneira and Marie Watts, will be displayed. Dennis's contribution is pointedly titled Return Our Stolen Sacred Shinnecock Hills (2022). Thomas says it was a priority that Dennis, a member of the Shinnecock Nation, and other “voices of the local community” take part in the show.

Thomas's own pieces in the exhibition include Remember Me (2022), a 55-foot-long neon sign installed on the Parrish's façade since the late spring. Its words quote a postcard sent from a Black soldier during World War I and even replicate his penmanship. “It's a beautiful homage to people who served this country but often aren't recognized,” says Corinne Erni, the senior curator at the Parrish who organized the show with Thomas and Carly Fischer.

Inside the Herzog & de Meuron–designed museum, Christine Sun Kim, who was born deaf, is making site-specific drawings based on sign language that will cover two facing walls, and Zoë Buckman will address violence against women with pieces such as like home like something (2022), for which she embroidered boxing gloves that dangle like festive ornaments. Several of Thomas's recent mazelike quilts stitched from scraps of American flags will also be on display; if you look closely at one, for example, it spells freedom. “The fabric of our nation seems to be fraying,” he says, “and this investigation into the various pathways and confusing methods we take to get to the ideals we subscribe to is what a lot of the work is attempting to reflect upon.”

Robb Report

“This is a really good moment to reflect on what it means to be American,” Erni adds, noting that one of Thomas’s works is made with remnants of not only the Stars and Stripes but also prison uniforms.

Muna Malik, who was born in Yemen, immigrated to Minnesota at the age of 10 and now lives in Los Angeles, offers her own take on migration and American identity with abstract paintings inspired by current events. She rendered one piece during the US military’s chaotic withdrawal from Afghanistan last summer and a second amid this past spring’s spate of mass shootings. Malik says she painted the works not with the intention of exhibiting them but as an “emotional release.”

“Essentially, the process is watching consistent news coverage and the stories being told about these major events that often have drastic outcomes for victims,” she explains before becoming choked up. Thomas steps in: “So they’re basically time capsules.”

Despite the stereotype of artists holding progressive views, Thomas, who will also take part in a slate of public programs during a residency at the nearby Watermill Center beginning in September, is adamant that For Freedoms is nonpartisan and traces the left-wing/right-wing binary to the extremism of the French Revolution. “I feel that we are at a moment in our society where we have to reevaluate everything we know and the way we used to do things,” he says. “The pandemic was an invitation into a new world and a new worldview. If we change the course of the future by one degree, it might give us millennia more of existence.”

San Antonio's McNay Art Museum adds 7-foot bronze snail sculpture to its outdoor collection

Hank Willis Thomas' History of the Conquest features a young girl perched atop an ornately decorated snail.

By Caroline Wolff on Tue, Jul 12, 2022 at 9:36 am

Courtesy of McNay Art Museum

Hank Willis Thomas, History of the Conquest, 2017. Bronze. Collection of the McNay Art Museum, Museum purchase with funds from Ben Foster in memory of Raye B. Foster, 2021.42.

San Antonio's McNay Art Museum recently unveiled the newest addition to its outdoor sculpture collection, which — despite possessing the likeness of a giant snail — has proven to be quite the opposite of sluggish and mundane, drawing hoards of visitors with its monumental scale and eye-catching decorative shell.

SAN ANTONIO CURRENT

Located in the museum's Mays Family Park, History of the Conquest by Hank Willis Thomas stands over 7 feet tall and features a young girl perched atop an ornately decorated snail, holding a bow in one hand and a pair of reins in the other. The snail's shell shines with a bronze finish and includes detailed engravings.

History of the Conquest is a reimagining of a 17th-century German sculpture — currently on display in the Wadsworth Atheneum Museum of Art in Hartford, Connecticut — and references Europe's profuse harvesting of the nautilus shell off the eastern coast of Africa.

"Thomas' sculpture is a captivating critique of the prejudiced, historical depictions of people of African descent," the McNay said in a press statement. "By enlarging the Wadsworth Atheneum's 17th-century sculpture to a grand scale and interpreting it in bronze, the artist simultaneously draws attention to past representations and reclaims them."

The sculpture's acquisition was made possible by a generous donation in memory of Raye B. Foster, a former McNay docent and member of the McNay Board of Trustees from 1998-2009.

The McNay's Head of Curatorial Affairs René Paul Barilleaux describes the acquisition of History of the Conquest as an important contribution to the museum's goal of "expanding its collection of artworks by contemporary artists of color — both indoors and outdoors."

It is the museum's first work in any medium by Hank Willis Thomas.

Black Power Afro pick sculpture is about as good as public art gets: Doug MacCash's review

"All Power to All People" was meant to help celebrate the Juneteenth holiday

A hair pick sculpture called "All Power to All People" by artist Hank Willis Thomas stands across the street from Gallier Hall in Lafayette Square park in New Orleans, Tuesday, June 21, 2022. (Photo by Sophia Germer, NOLA.com, The Times-Picayune | The New Orleans Advocate)

Sophia Germer

BY DOUG MACCASH | STAFF WRITER

JUN 20, 2022 - 1:59 PM

The gigantic steel sculpture of an Afro hair pick that appeared on St. Charles Avenue in the CBD last weekend is everything a public artwork ought to be. At 28 feet tall, the sculpture — decorated with a peace sign and topped by a clenched Black Power fist — demands attention and makes a clear statement that pretty much everyone can understand.

The towering piece, titled “All Power to All People” recalls a half-century of the Black Civil Rights Movement, from so-called radicals defiantly raising their fists in the 1960s to Black Lives Matter activists marching in the streets in recent years. And it does so with a whisper of wit, a nod to nostalgia and an evocation of peace.

Artist Hank Willis Thomas, the Brooklyn, New York-based artist who designed “All Power to All People,” was born in 1976. In a recorded statement, he said his grandmother was a hair stylist who “jammed” a pick through his hair to inflate it to the proper proportions. The pick had a Black Power fist on top.

“As a kid,” Thomas said, “I just thought of it as how you comb your hair.” But as he came of age, he recognized that the pick “was an icon of African American culture and history.”

The image of Grandma’s pick stuck in his head.

As an aspiring young artist, Thomas said he encountered, of all things, a four-story-tall clothespin in downtown Philadelphia. The absurd sculpture was by world-famous 1960s pop artist Claes Oldenburg, who created monuments devoted to the most ordinary stuff, like typewriter erasers, shuttlecocks and ... clothespins.

Oldenburg’s oversized clothespin stuck in Thomas’ head, too.

A few years back, Thomas blended the pick and the clothespin concepts into a 9-foot preliminary version of his “All Power to All People” design. But it had to be bigger. “It has a different reverence when you have to look up to it or be in the shadow of it,” he said.

The towering “All Power to All People” artwork is part of a traveling exhibit of outdoor sculptures called the “Monumental Tour,” which has had previous stops in Philadelphia, Chicago, Oakland and even the Burning Man art fest in Black Rock, Nevada. The arrival of “All Power to All People” in New Orleans was meant to help celebrate the Juneteenth holiday and the upcoming Essence Festival.

“Monumental Tour” director Marsha Reid said she’s the one who chose the location of the big Afro pick. She said that Lafayette Square was perfect because there was no fence around it, so people had unfettered access, plus the park is frequented by locals instead of tourists, and it’s in the center of city politics, with the modern City Hall and the federal courts not far away.

She didn't have the old Gallier Hall on her mind when she positioned “All Power to All People,” Reid said. But in ways, Gallier Hall, located across the street, is the perfect backdrop.

The old City Hall was finished in the 1850s. It had doubtlessly been built with slave labor and was a signature piece of architecture of the pro-slavery society of the time. Its neoclassical design venerates ancient Greece and Rome, also slave states.

An enormous sculpture by Hank Willis Thomas, shown Saturday, June 19, 2022, in Lafayette Square in New Orleans, recalls the Black power movement of the 1960s, when silhouettes of hair picks and raised fists were symbols of racial identity and political activism.

STAFF PHOTO BY DOUG MacCASH

Which makes it — intentionally or not — a symbolic foil for a sculpture that speaks to the African identity of much of the population.

There's no erasing the past, of course. But you can certainly have a conversation with it, and that's just what's going on down on St. Charles Avenue right now. The city's picturesque streetcars rumble between the two aspects of history, the unchallenged White rule of the past, and the ongoing striving for Black equity.

In art terms, that dialogue is a beautiful thing.

And that means "All Power to All People" is a beautiful thing, too. On one hand, it's a smile-evoking selfie-op based on a ridiculously enlarged comb that was popular with a past generation. In a way, it's comforting. On the other hand, it's a spark plug of social issues that's not supposed to make us comfortable at all. As Picasso supposedly put it, good art "ought to bristle with razor blades."

Neither City Hall nor Reid would disclose the cost of the "Monumental Tour" project.

COMMENTARY

‘In the heart of their hug’: Hank Willis Thomas on his ‘Embrace’ tribute to the Kings

As part of the inaugural Embrace Ideas Festival, the artist spoke in depth about his long-awaited memorial to Martin Luther King Jr. and Coretta Scott King. The 20-foot bronze sculpture is set to be unveiled on Boston Common on MLK Day next year.

By Murray Whyte Globe Staff, Updated June 16, 2022, 5:05 p.m.

Hank Willis Thomas, the artist behind "The Embrace," the long-awaited memorial to Coretta Scott King and Martin Luther King Jr., spoke at the ICA Wednesday as part of The Embrace Ideas Festival. LANE TURNER/GLOBE STAFF

Hank Willis Thomas reclined in a plush armchair on stage Wednesday at the Institute of Contemporary Art and smiled. The artist, who conceived “The Embrace,” the enigmatic, towering 20-foot bronze memorial to Martin Luther King Jr. and Coretta Scott King destined for Boston Common next year, had just finished his first in-depth public discussion about the project. It was a long, animated, and often playful conversation with King Boston executive director Imari Paris Jeffries — “we became Zoom BFFs over the past couple of years,” Jeffries said — and the floor had opened for questions.

The occasion, King Boston’s inaugural Embrace Ideas Festival, was triumphant. After pandemic delays, the memorial’s installation was set: Martin Luther King Jr. Day, 2023. The crowd was expectant, the mood ebullient. The first question, about Thomas’s creative process for the piece, brought the artist forward in his chair. “The process,” he said and laughed, “was, ‘We’re never going to get this, so let me just come up with some ideas.’”

Thomas’s proposal for the King memorial, made jointly with Boston-based MASS Design Group, wasn’t exactly a surprise winner when it was chosen among a field of five finalists in a design competition held by King Boston, the memorial’s sponsor, three years ago. The proposal was both bold and unconventional, traits not typically associated with major public art commissions, which too often set the low bar of being the least challenging to the most people.

Hank Willis Thomas, the artist behind "The Embrace," the long-awaited memorial to Coretta Scott King and Martin Luther King Jr., spoke with King Boston Executive Director Imari Paris Jeffries at the ICA Wednesday as part of The Embrace Ideas Festival. LANE TURNER/GLOBE STAFF

Thomas and MASS Design Group had great credentials, the artist with a history of frank, incisive work that digs at the heart of American racial division; and MASS Design Group with a portfolio of socially conscious projects, most prominently the National Memorial for Peace and Justice in Montgomery, Ala., dedicated to the thousands of lives lost to racial violence in America. Still, Thomas had his doubts. Not showing his subjects' faces in a memorial, Thomas said, made their chances "one in a million. But here we are."

In an interview earlier that day, Thomas told the Globe that what made the piece a long shot, in his view, was also its core strength. "When we recognize that all storytelling is an abstraction, all representation is an abstraction, hopefully it allows us to be open to more dynamic and complex forms of representation that don't stick us to narrative that oversimplifies a person or their legacy," he said. "And I think this work really tries to get to the heart of that.”

A young Martin and Coretta met here in Boston in 1952 while she was a student at the New England Conservatory of Music and he was a doctoral student at Boston University. They were a pair of idealists with a vision to change the world, and “The Embrace” captures a major step on that path. Its source is a 1964 photograph taken right after Martin Luther King Jr. was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize. In a moment of elated exhaustion, the picture shows the beaming Martin slumping into Coretta’s arms; she holds him, eyes closed. The memorial renders in three dimensions the tangle of his and Coretta’s arms and his hands resting on her shoulder.

Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. hugs his wife, Coretta, during a news conference following the announcement that he had been awarded the Nobel Peace Prize. BETTMANN

“I wanted to make something that really talked about love,” Thomas told the audience Wednesday. “I saw in that moment, how much of his weight was literally on top of her. And I thought that was a really symbolic idea: That she was literally holding his weight. And that’s true in so many relationships, and especially relationships of that era with men and women, where the wives had to carry the burden of the man who was getting the award.”

Thomas’s and Jeffries’s conversation was the keystone event of “The Saving Power of Culture,” the theme of the third day of the five-day festival, which also included a panel discussion on the changing nature of monuments amid the social upheavals of the day. Thomas explained how he chose to make an emotional portrait of the Kings, not a literal one, a profound decision that defies every convention of permanent public memorials. Off-the-rack monuments to “great men,” often on horseback, usually en route to or from one war or another — look around town; we have plenty — are the norm. “The Embrace,” with its couple entwined, debunks simplistic ideas about anyone being singular and achieving greatness alone.

Thomas, who grew up in New York and Washington, D.C., has spent a lot of time thinking about art in the public sphere. “For Freedoms,” his ongoing, artist-led collaboration with Eric Gottesman, Michelle Woo, and Wyatt Gallery, holds public forums and makes temporary interventions all over the country on billboards and overpasses, pinned to the political realities of the moment. “I think all art is activism,” Thomas told the crowd. “I think all consciously lived lives are activism. If you wake up, and you say ‘I am, and I can,’ you’re already an activist.”

“The Embrace” — which is currently being fabricated at the Walla Walla Foundry in Washington state — is different from anything he has done. It is prominent, destined for what’s considered the oldest public park in the country; meant to be permanent, as memorials tend to be; and huge, big enough to pass underneath and see sky through its clenched arms. “That’s really the core of it: When you walk inside of it, you will be in the heart of their hug,” Thomas said.

Rendering of “The Embrace,” the memorial monument and plaza dedicated to Martin Luther King Jr. and Coretta Scott King on Boston Common. The completed project, created by Hank Willis Thomas and Mass Design Group, will be installed early next year. DESIGN BY HANK WILLIS THOMAS AND MASS DESIGN GROUP. IMAGE BY MASS DESIGN GROUP.

Thomas remembers showing his first sketch to Michael Murphy, executive director of MASS Design Group. “The idea that we thought was least likely to get [chosen] was the one that spoke to our hearts,” Thomas said. “It was this reality that the thing that scared us, that way spoke to our hearts," Thomas said. "It has this reality, that the thing that caused us, that may that it felt a little bit haunting, is why it felt like it was what needed to be made."

Thomas is willing to buck at least one more convention of the public memorial: permanence. "I think we have to ask: Will this be important in 100 years? When do we get to review this?" he said in conversation with Jeffries. "To create a greater balance and equity for future generations, [to] make sure that nothing is put up that doesn't have a question mark attached, about how it's contributing to society."

With more than half a year left before the piece is unveiled in its at-minimum very long-term home on the Common, he can allow himself a moment to exhale, and dream.

"There's something really amazing for me to think about these two young lovers, who met here in Boston, walking in that park, and for all I know, embracing steps away from where this monument will be, and having that resonate not only all over the world, but also throughout space and time," Thomas said. "And I hope that other young lovers will be walking in this space, and remember that when they embrace one another, that they also could be embracing the world."

Murray Whyte can be reached at murray.whyte@globe.com. Follow him on Twitter @TheMurrayWhyte.

Show comments

Believe It

— Art

April 20, 2022

I first came across the work of visual artist Hank Willis Thomas reading a book called Who We Be: The Colorization of America by Jeff Chang. The year was 2013 and, at the time, I was a community organizer in my hometown of Newark, New Jersey. But I was beginning to find limitations to the impact traditional models of organizing could have in my community. It was the beginning of a personal renaissance where I revisited Black art and images as a tool for helping to mend the psychological effects of years of neglect and abandonment and the disenfranchisement of American urban communities and their inhabitants by the powers that be. The first piece by Hank that I can honestly say I really appreciated was Strange Fruit, 2013. In it, there's a basketball player with a ball in hand hanging from a noose—an image that references the brutal history of lynching in America.

Growing up in an urban environment, sports and specifically basketball were very important to me in my formative years. In Hank's Branded series, I saw him posing similar questions that I was having about what it meant to be a Black man coming of age in America. Hank has continually returned to images of sports players and the peculiar role they inhabit in the American psyche throughout his practice. His work has continuously examined the complex relationship between sports, capitalism and the Black body, showcasing the glory associated with sports stardom, but also critiquing the power structures at play.

In Hank's Unbranded series, he deconstructs advertisements, showing how our identities as Americans are often shaped by the media and the roles corporations have prescribed to various racial, ethnic and gender groups. Looking at his artwork sparked within me a passion for looking beyond the surface, and questioning the purpose of various institutions, ideas and cultural practices that I previously never considered.

In 2015, I applied for a role in his studio, met Hank, and witnessed the brilliance of his mind and work in person. I was able to see firsthand how his artworks were created and get to know the small but passionate group of collaborators who worked with him at the time helping to bring his vision to reality. Working in the studio, I was given the opportunity to participate in a four-person team that toured his public art project, In Search Of the Truth, across 35 states and 43 cities during Donald Trump's first presidential run. Traveling around the country in a tour bus, engaging with Americans from all over, and meeting artists and curators from some of the country's most elite museums opened up a new world of possibilities for me as a creative. It changed the way I perceived myself as a Black man, as an American, and even the way I perceived the concept of 'truth.'

My connection to Hank's work is much more than just an aesthetic conversation—it's about the ideas that engaging with his work has sparked within me. For me, interviewing Hank for this article is the culmination of a practice in the future.

Coat LUAR, pants SUPREME NEW YORK, shoes DENIM TEARS X UGG, sunglasses FLATLIST

EMANN ODUFU—When I think of the evolution of your practice, it is constantly evolving, and you are always reinventing yourself and the type of work you create. Obviously, a framework permeates throughout your practice and your oeuvre. Still, I would like you to speak to your process of reinvention, especially when I look at your work from the late 2000s to now. Is this something that you're thinking about as you create, or does it naturally manifest as you change with the times?

HANK WILLIS THOMAS—For me, change is necessary for growth, and as the times are rapidly evolving, I also need to do that. The core of my work is still there, but the methods and mediums that I use to express the important things have had to evolve. Also, who I'm talking to and how I'm speaking to them has changed by demand. I went from talking about brands in the early 2000s to creating brands through projects such as Question Bridge, For Freedoms and Truth Booth. They are all my own take on what a and marketing and how our processes engage them.

EMANN ODUFU—Collaboration is something that is very important to your practice, even harkening back to In Search of the Truth, which was a collaboration between you and three other artists. With For Freedoms, Writing on the Wall, and the Wide Awakes, the work you did took this collaborative aspect to a whole new level. One of your works that comes to mind is from your I am a man series, specifically the piece that says, ‘I am many.’ Especially when working in your studio, I noticed that your work was the product of a village of creatives and collaborators working to capture your vision. What is the importance of collaboration and community in your practice?

HANK WILLIS THOMAS—Everything we do in life is a collaboration because no one lives or works in a vacuum. A lot of the ways in which we talk about our lives are as if we're the only ones affected by whatever we're experiencing. So, I've always collaborated with other artists in addition to making my own work, to remind myself and others who I care about—and even people I don't know—that we all have a stake in what each other does. Creativity is an outlet and opportunity for us to think about ourselves, the things we care about and each other differently.

EO—From my perspective, that process of collaboration evolved into something even larger with works like For Freedoms and the Wide Awakes, which were these mass collaborations that sparked a national movement. I'm curious to know why you, as an artist, decided to create these works?

Jacket TELFAR, pants and shoes BALENCIAGA

HWT—For Freedoms and the Wide Awakes were inspired by my desire to work with and celebrate the work of other artists. With For Freedoms, we did activations in exhibition halls and a national billboard campaign that allowed us to engage audiences that none of us individually could reach. We did this by engaging billboards and public space as an artistic medium. The Wide Awakes built on this idea because it is not an organization. Instead, it is a very loose and organic collective. It was a more liberated attempt at doing the same things we were doing with For Freedoms. But there was no centrality to the collaboration this time, so all the participants were creating it. There's an excitement to that. There's also no barrier to entry or gatekeepers. The only gatekeeper is the person themselves.

EO—How do you balance being a fine artist and being concerned with the formal applications of the creative process with your burgeoning role as an activist, a community builder, and even as a political voice?

HWT—I do that through working with the people in my studio. I'm also collaborating outside of my studio in the streets of the world and on the Internet. The people in my studio help me focus on maintaining and clarifying the messages in my work. That is an aesthetic conversation as well as a content conversation.

EO—Well, whatever you're doing, it's working. The seeds that you and your creative team are planting have been harvested to make an impact that the collections of esteemed museums and influential collectors. So, what keeps you motivated to go into the studio and keep creating? What's inspiring you at this moment?

HWT—I read a book in 2019 called Finite and Infinite Games by James Carse, which really helped me to understand my purpose. Carse talks about finite games as being played for the purpose of winning and infinite games as being played for the purpose of continuing the play. A finite game is to be won by someone, and it must come to a definite end. An infinite game is a vision of life as play and possibility. So, I realized that I'm playing an infinite game and I am not trying to win. I'm trying to stay in a state of play. We live in a world with the illusion that there is some form of finality, and for me, playing an infinite game is continuing to expand and challenge the limitations of the world that you know and the person you are. That's what keeps me going. When we say we're going to take an inflatable speech bubble across the country where strangers would come and share their truths, there's not really any finite rewards. The reward is the journey. The exhibition is an artifact, but the artwork is the actual journey itself.

EO—One thing I'm thinking about consistently is how the creative world has drastically transformed in the past 20 years. In my opinion, there are no boxes—or fewer boxes for creatives—and the lines between creative realms are blurring. Artists are not staying in one lane anymore, and the best example of that is probably Kanye West. He started off making music, and now he's a leader in fashion and breaking into the tech world. Even for you, I see you existing between creative fields and between realms. Can you speak to this changing atmosphere? What opportunities does it bring for a multifaceted creative like yourself?

“What is for sale are the complex
ideas that are at WORK.

HWT—The world is constantly changing. I think you're right that the past 20 years have appeared to be radically and rapidly evolving, asking each of us to reevaluate who we are, what we are, what we do and how we do it. But I don't think that's limited to the creative field. From my experience, it's how we're experiencing gender, how we're experiencing race, how we're experiencing class, even how we're experiencing nationality. Over the past 20 years, the way we look at things that have been relatively fixed has become much more complicated. I don't separate the way that I live and what I do into work and not work or art and not art. It's all my life. I'm an eclectic person who has a broad range of interests, and this is something that a lot of people of African descent negotiate. We negotiate being multifaceted, complex people and being expected to conform or live within a box already prescribed for us. I don't think that's just people of African descent, but I think that the pressure of the box feels more confining for many of us in this country. So, for me and I imagine many others, excelling outside of the place where we first gained 'validity' is a way of finding some form of liberation or emancipation.

EO—I really dig that answer. I want to delve into your recent exhibition, The New Black Aesthetic. We've talked a little bit about this before, but throughout your practice, you often return to images of sports players, examining the complex relationship between the sports industry and Black men. In some of my favorite works of yours, especially the older pieces, you made powerful critiques on the sports industry. Your Liberty sculpture almost presents a different perspective when you look at it—it's more of an uplifting or aspirational type of feeling that I get from looking at it. On one end, you're celebrating the upward mobility created through these athletes' ascent into superstardom. On the other end, we see a critique of the power structures that permeate them. Can you speak to this duality and the nuanced way you enjoy and participate in the spectacle of sports, or I guess any system, while also understanding some of the deeper implications?

HWT—This question makes me think of Guy Debord's book, The Society of Spectacle. In it, he describes the spectacle or what we would call the modern-day media machine as an instrument to distract and pacify the human interaction. Carce says 'the spectacle is not a collection of images rather, it is a social relation among people, mediated by images.' [Debord's] book is a multi-faceted and shifting gaze on the spectacle and spectator. It embodies some of my thoughts in a lifelong process of finding myself in relation to the spectacle of sports and the NBA and any other spectacle in which I might be participating. In my work, I'm engaging in this conversation, acknowledging the allure of the spectacle and breaking down these symbols and images to help the viewer and myself make sense of what you called 'the deeper implications.'

EO—When I applied for a role in your studio years ago, I remember stating that I saw you as the 'Black Richard Prince' in my cover letter. I'm not sure if you read the cover letters or if someone else read them...

HWT—No, I read the cover letters.

EO—I like to think that was part of the reason why you guys were like, 'Okay, we'll give him a shot.' Obviously, you and Richard Prince have entirely different practices. Still, I think I was speaking to the ability you just referenced to take images and symbols that are recognizable in our society, deconstructing them in a way that questions the way our world operates. I view you as a social psychologist and even a cultural healer. In a hundred years, when we look back at your practice, what impact do you want it to have on people on a social and psychological level?

HWT—Isn't it enough to just be remembered? That's my answer to that question, but I can expand on it.

EO—I would absolutely love for you to expand on it!

HWT—One hundred years from now, will there even be a world as we know it, based on the catastrophic forecasts we are learning about? I want people to be alive, safe and healthy in a society where the work that I/we make is still relevant. If those circumstances exist, I would hope they are somewhat proud of who we are and what we have done. Think about it: this generation knows that the world is overpopulated and that our lifestyles are creating irreparable harm to all future societies. This generation has had more privilege than any other generation of human beings collectively, yet has not overcome the desire to kill and maim other human beings and has my work, which is my life, I would love for future generations to think that I cared about them... But it would also be enough just to be remembered.

Recommended articles

— Art

High Art Happy Meal

Euclid's Porsche at NYC's Rental Gallery gives us 152 Happy Meals.

— Art

Light Up with Nikolas Soren Goodich

Nikolas Soren Goodich has been an artist for as long as he can remember.

— Art

Opaque News

This virtual exhibit features works that take on Trump.

OPINION

REDESIGNING AMERICA'S FLAG

Six New Takes on Old Glory

This essay is part of “Snap Out of it, Americal,” a series exploring bold ideas to revitalize and renew the American experiment.

The American flag is a potent piece of national iconography, but its design shifted frequently until the early 1900s. What if it were redesigned today? We asked artists and graphic designers to try. The flags they came up with reflect a mix of approaches. Some are functional designs, others artistic renderings; some represent America as it could be, others how the artist sees the country now.

Hank Willis Thomas
“Lift Every Voice and Sing”
Black lives matter
Don’t tread on me
In God we trust
A thin blue line
Under God, our vindicator
Keep America great
Progress pride

SEPTEMBER 23, 2021

Monumental Tour features sculptures examining themes from Black history

Four temporary art installations can be found throughout Center City through January

BY HANNAH KANIK
PhillyVoice Staff

The traveling Monumental Tour landed in Philadelphia this week, bringing art that honors African American history to iconic landmarks across the city.

Sculptures from Arthur Jafa, Coby Kennedy, Christopher Myers and Hank Willis Thomas will be on display until Jan. 31 at four locations near the Benjamin Franklin Parkway and Delaware River waterfront.

Kindred Arts, the tour organizers, said the works examine themes of colonization, oppression, privilege, Black middle-class labor and Black pride.

The sculptures delve into various aspects of the African American experience, "from the first slaves brought over in the 16th century to the present-day prison pipeline, and the struggle of liberation in between," according to a press release.

Philadelphia is the sixth stop on the nationwide tour, but this marks the first time that the four sculptures are being displayed at the same time.

The tour also will showcase Julian Francis Abele, Philadelphia's first African American architect who helped design iconic buildings like The Philadelphia Museum of Art.

Michael Spain, director of education at the Center for Architecture and Design, will host a walking audio tour through all of the featured sculptures.

Here is a look at the featured sculptures:

COURTESY/ALBERT YEE

'All Power to All People,' by Hank Willis Thomas is located on Eakins Oval, near the Philadelphia Museum of Art.

"All Power to All People"

Hank Willis Thomas' sculpture, "All Power to All People," is a 28-foot tall Afro pick with the Black Power salute emerging from the handle. Its title is a reference to the Black Panther Party slogan.

Thomas, a conceptual artist, said the piece is a symbol of community, strength, perseverance, comradeship and belonging. He has had work exhibited across the country and abroad.

The sculpture is on display at Eakins Oval, 2451 Benjamin Franklin Parkway.

Traveling 'Monumental Tour' brings art to four iconic Philly spots

By Ximena Conde · September 21, 2021

 Hank Willis Thomas's "All Power to All People" stands 28 feet tall and weighs 24,000lbs. It is installed in Eakins Oval as part of the Monumental Tour, made up of four large sculptures installed in celebrated public places. (Albert Yee/Kindred Arts)

A touring exhibition designed to challenge colonial ideas of power, community, and incarceration has landed in Philadelphia, bringing four art pieces to some of the city's most prominent public spaces.

The pieces that make up the "Monumental Tour" have rotated through New York City, Atlanta, Chicago, and other cities. The traveling art aims to affirm people across Philadelphia's diverse communities while creating spaces where those willing can learn about other lived experiences. This is the project's second stop in Philadelphia.

📷 Kindred Arts Director Marsha Reid, who curated Monumental Tour, speaks at the unveiling of Hank Willis Thomas's "All Power to All People" on Eakins Oval. (Emma Lee/WHYY)

Familiar to the city will be a 28-foot-tall Afro pick with raised fist capping the handle. A symbol of “community, strength, perseverance, comradeship, and belonging,” the pick sits on the base of the Benjamin Franklin Parkway with the Art Museum as the backdrop. Named “All Power to All People,” the sculpture by artist Hank Willis Thomas was first seen in 2017 as part of the Monument Lab project.

Parks and Rec unveiled its Parkway installation Tuesday. It brought a jolt of new energy to a historic space steeped in old ideas of institutional power and now undergoing a long-awaited reinvention.

Commissioner of Philadelphia Parks and Recreation Kathryn Ott Lovell said it's only fitting to have “All Power to All People” on the parkway as the department tries to make it a vehicle for community building and civic expression. The exhibit is a reminder art should enhance the aesthetic of shared spaces, while challenging previously held assumptions, said Ott Lovell.

Getting Soccer Fans Into Art? That's the Goal.

A new gallery at the stadium of Tottenham Hotspur, a top London club, is presenting contemporary works to visitors, with mixed results.

By Alex Marshall

Aug. 16, 2021

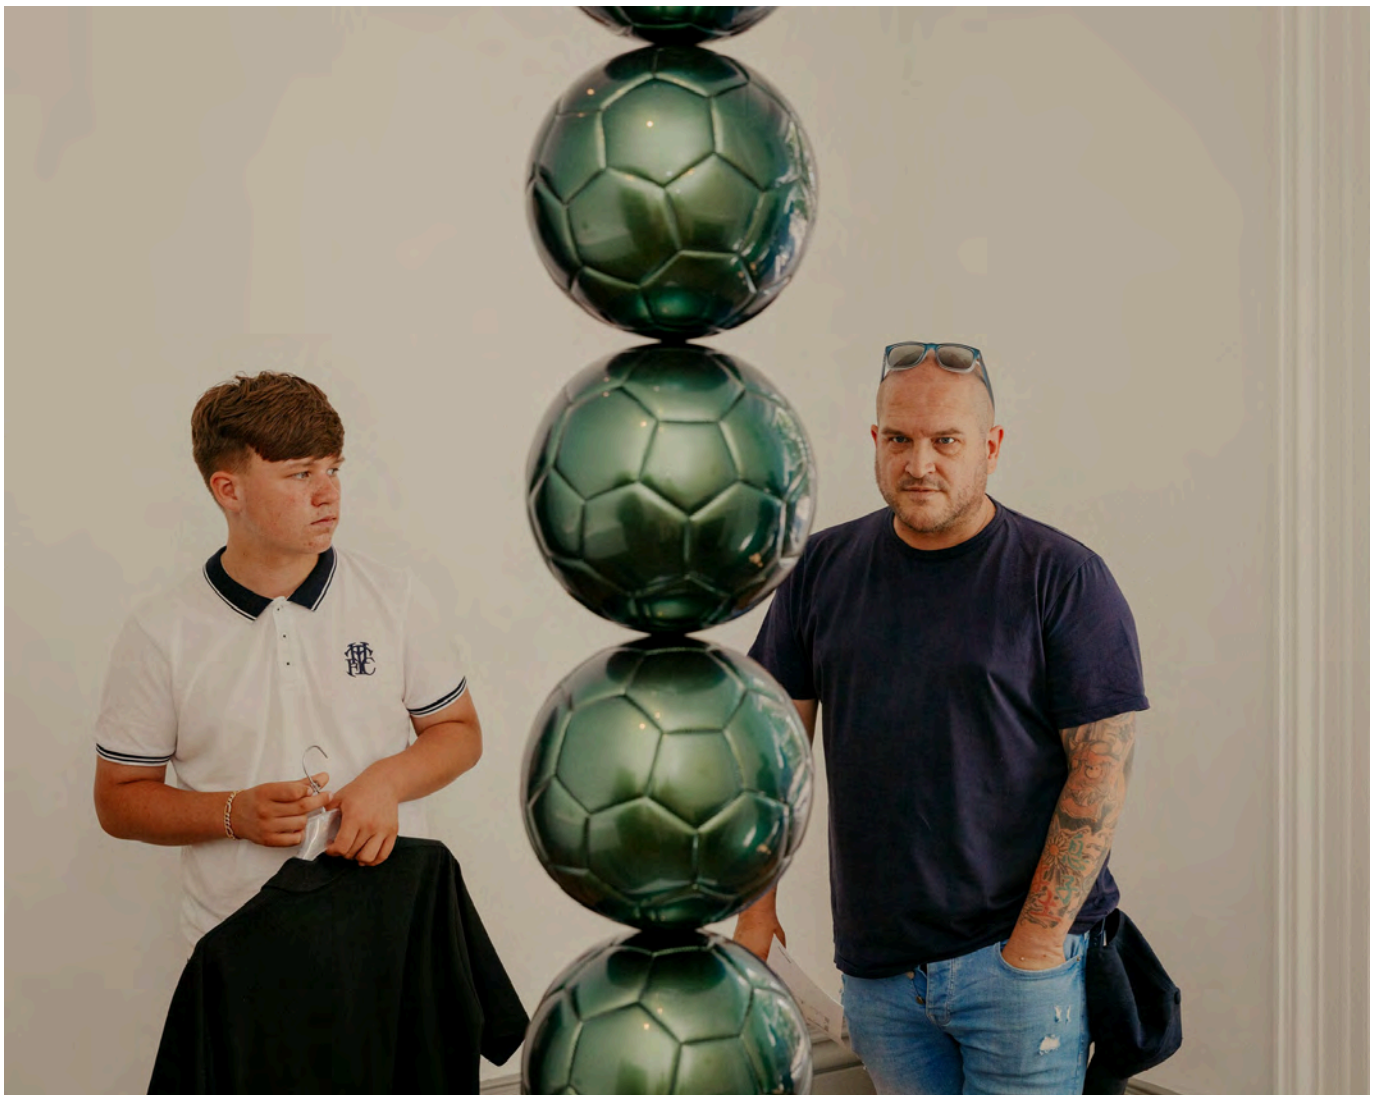

LONDON — Annie Lawrence, 8, was looking excited on Sunday afternoon. She was about to see Tottenham Hotspur, the soccer team she supports, play its first game of the English Premier League season — but her exhilaration wasn't entirely because of the impending game.

Lawrence was standing in OOF, a gallery dedicated to art about soccer that opened last month in a building attached to the club's stadium gift shop. Some of the works on display seemed to be making her as happy as a Tottenham win.

OOF's opening show, "Balls" (until Nov. 21) features 17 pieces of contemporary art made using soccer balls, or representing them. There's one made out of concrete, and another in silicon that looks like it's covered in nipples.

Pointing at a huge bronze of a deflated ball by Marcus Harvey, Lawrence said, "I'd like that one in my bedroom." The artist said in a phone interview that the work might evoke anything from Britain's decline as an imperial power to the end of childhood.

Yet for Lawrence, its appeal was simpler: "It looks like you could sit in it, like a couch," she said.

"Endless Column III," a 2017 work by Hank Willis Thomas, on display in the exhibition space, which is called OOF. Alex Ingram for The New York Times

Arts and Culture

The Monumental Tour Art Exhibition Comes to Englewood.

Danielle Sanders, Interim Managing Editor

June 24, 2021

When people speak of the Englewood neighborhood in Chicago, they rarely mention art, culture, walking trails, or sustainable food. Anton Seals, Co-Founder and Executive Director of Grow, Greater Englewood is working to change that. With the Monumental Tour, an outdoor installation featuring the works of acclaimed artist, Hank Willis Thomas, and Arthur Jafa, Anton Seals hopes this latest project continues to lift and empower the Englewood community.

On display until the end of August, Hank Williams Thomas, “All Power to All People” will be located in Englewood Square at 5801 S. Halsted and Arthur Jafa’s “Big Wheel” will be in Bronzeville at the Blanc Gallery at 4445 S. Martin Luther King Jr., Drive. The monumental tour is a national tour that brings iconic monuments across the United States for the purposes of advancing the demand for racial equity.

Hank Willis Thomas’ All Power to All People is a provocative artwork combining the Afro pick and the Black Power salute, both icons of Black identity and empowerment. At approximately 28 feet tall, the work stands as a symbol of community, strength, perseverance, comradeship, and belonging. The sculpture’s title references a legendary Black Panther Party slogan—its arrival to Chicago, where the Illinois chapter of the Black Panther Party was headquartered, is a celebration of Chicago’s contribution to civic engagement and the advancement of social justice. All Power to All People is illustrative of the artist’s longstanding investigation into the role public art plays in shaping collective discourse and societal values.

“Art has always been the dialogue of revolution, pushing urgent issues to the forefront of culture,” said Marsha Reid, Director of Kindred Arts. “We believe these monumental symbols of identity and empowerment, by Thomas and Jafa, have a critical role to play in our historical moment in time.”

Arthur Jafa’s Big Wheel is a spacious, yearning, and open-ended installation comprising four gargantuan, seven-foot tires originally made for monster trucks. Each is laced with a mesh of iron chain; in lieu of hubcaps, abstract medallion sculptures are 3-D printed from melted chains. Like industrial chakras, they manifest Jafa’s obsession with the culture of monster vehicles that has fascinated him since his Mississippi childhood. The heavy manufacturing evokes America’s economic changes, notably the deindustrialization and transition to the service economy that Jafa’s generation watched unfold and that dashed so many Black middle-class aspirations. The installation features a sound component consisting of a loop of Teddy Pendergrass ballads that emit from floor speakers. The songs are as much an authentic product of late-industrial America as are the tires and gantry.

“Wide Awakes Chicago’s intention is to respect the value of Black spaces by placing the artists’ works directly within the sight of residents from the Bronzeville and Englewood communities,” said Wide Awakes Chicago member, Mario Smith. “The Chicago leg of Monumental will also spark dialogue and reintroduce some of Chicago’s finest visual artists, DJs, and musicians to the city as we begin to reopen.”

Established in 2014, Grow Greater Englewood works to build a community in which all people can live safe, happy, healthy, and fulfilling lives, now and into the future. Grow Greater Englewood is a social enterprise that works with residents and developers to create sustainable, food economies and green businesses to empower residents to create wellness and wealth. Anton Seals spoke about the importance of the Monumental tour in the Englewood community saying, “when this opportunity came, we wanted to be able to toy with this notion of what does it mean, to have black spaces. So, this becomes an opportunity. We started in the farmers market there on Halsted, which used to be a big vacant lot. There is beauty in our own community, and we just do not want to talk about it, we must demonstrate it. In addition, we have a farm, we are building with Chicago architecture biennial site as well. There will be a plaza area that we are in the middle of constructing that will be on the other side near Halsted. So, there is a lot that is going to be synergized. We thought this all power to all people would be a good conversation starter for drawing attention to what does it mean to have black spaces”?

He continued saying, “with the MonumentalTour, just having these black artists of note display their pieces in our communities, that is significant. These artists sell their pieces for millions of dollars, and they are on display around the world but for them, they said, yeah that is nice but what does that do for the black aesthetic? That is our responsibility, but it is also a mirror back to the community. What is it that we really want and what is already here and how do we connect those dots? That is where people who are weavers, like me, come in. I am a weaver. I am a leader, but I am also a weaver. I like to weave and bring and create platforms for others and institutions because that is the only way that we are going to survive”.

Those interested in learning more about the Monumental Tour can visit the exhibit virtually at www.monumentaltour.org or in-person from a motor vehicle. For more information on Grow Greater Englewood visit www.growgreaterenglewood.org.

An Open Letter Signed by Hank Willis Thomas Asks the U.S. to Take in Afghan Artists

By Helen Holmes · 08/25/21 10:52am

A Taliban fighter walks past a beauty salon in Kabul on August 18, 2021. WAKIL KOHSAR/AFP via Getty Images

In the wake of reports that the Taliban has unilaterally taken over Afghanistan, prompting thousands of people to desperately attempt to leave the country and sparking dire worries about Afghanistan's cultural heritage, over 350 artists and cultural figures have signed an open letter imploring the United States to make moves to protect Afghan creatives. Published on Tuesday, the letter, which was put together by the Arts for Afghanistan group, has been signed by luminaries including Hank Willis Thomas, Susan Meiselas, Naeem Mohaiemen, Walid Raad, Michael Rakowitz and Coco Fusco. The document also includes suggestions in terms of concrete steps American officials can take in order to "facilitate the departure from Afghanistan of at-risk Afghans, and to include artists, filmmakers, performers, and writers in that category."

For example, the letter suggests that the US government "immediately include cultural workers in the categories being used to refer at-risk Afghans for evacuation lists," and "keep the Kabul airport open until all at-risk Afghans who wish to evacuate have done so, and allow chartered, commercial, and humanitarian flights to operate out of the airport under the protection of the US."

"Even before the Taliban's takeover, cultural workers took grave risks in depicting the experiences and articulating the aspirations of Afghans, with the encouragement—and, often, direct support—of the US government," the letter reads. "Now, the vocation of truth-telling has become much more dangerous, and many of our peers see no choice but to leave the country."

Indeed, Afghans and other cultural commentators alike have already expressed concern that Afghanistan's new regime could negatively impact cultural artifacts and cultural workers. "We're all waiting to see what the general position is going to be," Bastien Varoutsikos, the director of an organization that digitizes vulnerable heritage sites, told The Art Newspaper recently. "From a political standpoint, it's unclear if the Taliban will engage in destructions of high value heritage landmarks considering the new narrative they're attempting to build."

ARTFORUM

Demonstrators in Rotterdam rally on behalf of Afghans protesting and fleeing the Taliban. Photo: Donald Trung Quoc Don/Wikipedia Commons.
August 25, 2021 at 5:16pm

HUNDREDS OF ARTISTS SIGN OPEN LETTER CALLING FOR US TO OFFER ASYLUM TO AFGHAN CULTURE WORKERS

More than 350 cultural workers including artists Coco Fusco, Joyce Kozloff, Susan Meiselas, Naeem Mohaiemen, Walid Raad, Michael Rakowitz, Martha Rosler, Hank Willis Thomas, Cecilia Vicuña, and Martha Wilson, as well as writers Teju Cole, Hari Kunzru, Viet Thanh Nguyen, and Lynne Tillman, have lent their signatures to a fiery open letter from Arts for Afghanistan demanding that the US government “do everything in its power” to assist at-risk Afghans fleeing the country in an attempt to escape the newly ascendant Taliban rule. According to the authors of the letter, released August 24, the members of this group—among them artists, curators, writers, filmmakers, and performers—were in a precarious position even before the militant Islamist coalition’s swift rise to power, thanks to their efforts in illuminating Afghans' daily lives and aspirations often with the approval and assistance of the US government, which has now effectively abandoned them.

In the letter, Arts for Afghanistan calls for the US government to expedite visas for cultural workers and drop the stipulation that the visas be processed in a third country. Reaching out to countries beyond the United States, the missive's writers additionally "call on governments of all nations to facilitate the evacuation and resettlement of Afghan refugees by offering asylum and aid," asserting, "We insist on the protection of all who have devoted themselves to fostering free expression and civil society in Afghanistan."

"Art is a proxy for humanity," said Eric Gottesman, a political scientist and one of the letter's coauthors. "As we can see unfolding in real time in Afghanistan and elsewhere around the world, the voices of artists are considered dangerous because they speak truth to power."

Also signing the missive were arts and humanitarian organizations the Authors Guild, CECArtsLink, Creative Capital, For Freedoms, Magnum Foundation, and PEN America, the last of which recently called on the US government to protect its writers in Afghanistan after two Pen Afghanistan members were murdered by the Taliban.

Helmut Lang and Hank Willis Thomas announce limited collection

· davidloudos · 2 weeks ago

Good style usually follows a subtle line between being yourself and appealing to your appearance. New collection by Helmut Lang And conceptual artist Hank Willis Thomas did the difficult task of encapsulating this constant pull and pull.

Named “It’s All About You / It’s Not About You,” this exclusive collection is inspired by Thomas’ 2010 lenticular work, “It’s All About You.” The words “It’s All About You” and “It’s Not About You” are displayed in block letters on 10 points of hoodies, T-shirts, and dresses, and different messages emerge depending on the position of the viewer.

These changing messages are expressed by a unique garment technique inspired by the Spring 2004 Helmut Lang Reverse Cowboy T-shirt.

“Helmut Lang has developed a technology that changes what people see, based on their physical relationship with the person wearing the shirt,” said Thomas. WWD “Invite viewers to think about how their position affects what they see.”

Limited collection released today June 3rd HelmutLang.com 15% of the proceeds from this collection will be donated to the Incarceration Nations Network, a think tank focused on global prison reform efforts.

Helmut Lang and Hank Willis Thomas announce limited collection.

CULTUREWORKS' MILESTONE, IN-PERSON FRIEZE NEW YORK PROGRAMMING

WIDE AWAKES, ANTWAUN SARGENT, THE PHILIP GLASS ENSEMBLE, TOM OF FINLAND AND MORE ANCHORED A WEEK OF IN-PERSON EVENTS

David Graver 11 May 2021

Tracey Ryans, Tanya Selvaratnam, Hank Willis Thomas, Larry Ossei-Mensah

Frieze New York did more than put people in front of art, together, after we all spent 14 months at home. The acclaimed fair and its ancillary events allowed people to find inspiration, contribute to conversations and recreate a sense of community for those eager to gather safely. At the forefront, CultureWorks, the union of the collaborative creative space NeueHouse and future-forward photo museum Fotografiska, championed the return to in-person events with powerful talks, riveting performances and private dinners that proved New York's broader curatorial scene no longer remains dormant.

As Fotografiska welcomed guests to the opening off its glossy, often candy-colored Miles Aldridge exhibition, it also hosted a standout talk by author and Gagosian director Antwaun Sargent, as well as a dinner to celebrate the Tom of Finland Foundation and its “Darkroom” presentation. Fotografiska also activated its hidden cocktail-haven, Chapel Bar, and glowing fine-dining restaurant, Verōnika. Programming at NeueHouse started with many people’s first in-person panel discussion in more than a year, which was delivered by members of the Wide Awakes. The change-making, open-source network brought such gravity to their talk, it empowered guests, who were timid at first to be in a room with so many others (even though we all wore masks).

Chief Brand Officer of NeueHouse and Fotografiska, Jon Goss tells us that this thoughtful and joyous conversation—between Hank Willis Thomas, Larry Ossei-Mensah, Tracey Ryans and Tanya Selvaratnam—came to be a part of their Frieze roster because “art and activism have always been a pillar of NeueHouse’s cultural programming DNA. Cognizant of the importance of art in advancing social causes and our relationship with some of the founders of the Wide Awakes, we wanted to support their mission to ‘create a new culture in pursuit of liberation.’” In collaboration with the Wide Awakes, NeueHouse will continue to produce a series of roundtable discussions “featuring prominent creatives to explore current cultural, political and societal topics and themes” which they’ll then share through NeueJournal.

Hank Willis Thomas, courtesy of BFA

“This first talk in our new Madison Square Gallery space—with Hank, Larry, Tanya and Tracey—was a free-flowing and empowering conversation to witness in non-digital form, and truly lived up to the moment,” Goss says. It’s a sentiment with which we concur. He adds, “NeueHouse spaces

The Tribute to Vision & Justice is more than just a section, it's a fair-wide project. More than 50 art galleries and institutions will focus on showing artwork that deals with justice as a tribute to Lewis, an art history professor at Harvard University, and her work with the Vision & Justice Project.

It's an education and art platform she founded, which takes its inspiration from Frederick Douglass' civil war speech Pictures and Progress, centering in on the power of images to create a new vision for the country.

▲ Sarah Elizabeth Lewis. Photograph: Stu Rosner

“I see professor Lewis’ role as a scholar and educator, and as the founder of the project, being honored because of her work,” said Loring Randolph, the director of programming at Frieze New York.

“She is also an inspiration as an intellectual mind, a trailblazer, a professional, and hopefully by paying tribute to her and to the Vision & Justice Project, her mission becomes more visible and more heard.”

To Lewis, museums are integral for defining and redefining the narratives that shape history. But art fairs?

They are typically where one goes to buy art. For heady theory, that’s biennale territory. Go to Mainfesta or Documenta if you want to think. “This is not just about the fair, but about looking all around us,” said Randolph.

Lewis is not necessarily a guest curator, but each gallery is responding to the questions she’s asking with her project. “I’m young, in terms of academia. The tribute feels - I was startled by it,” said Lewis. “The only way I found to engage others was to pay tribute to those before me.”

There will be talks based on justice and new commissioned artworks by Carrie Mae Weems and Hank Willis Thomas. Pieces by Wynton Marsalis, Ava DuVernay and others will be on view.

The project is known for hosting ongoing discussions on topics related to images with mass incarceration, civic engagement and the arts, as well as algorithmic bias and the environment. In one talk, Chelsea Clinton discusses the water crisis in Flint, Michigan.

Lewis, who served on Barack Obama's National Arts Policy Committee, and is known for bringing the project into the spotlight in 2016, when she guest edited an issue of the photography magazine Aperture, entitled Vision & Justice. In response, the magazine issue helped inspire a conversation in American arts about the role of photography in race and justice.

“The overwhelming success of the project shows just how willing multitudes of people need and want to be a part of the conversation around equity and justice in our society right now,” said photographer Dawoud Bey. “It also provides a sense of how rigorous art practice and work with a strong social content are not mutually exclusive.”

Lewis helps the public understand the roots of visual literacy in relation to African American civic life, and that visual images can be an agent for change with the narratives of black life. “It’s thinking of the social function of the arts historically and over time,” she explains.

It all started as a class at Harvard. When Lewis stood before her Vision & Justice class, a jam-packed room of 300 students, one of the key things she initially asked was: “What is our nation of arts and culture for enlarging our notion of who counts and who belongs in society?”

▲ Dawoud Bey – Braxton McKinney and Lavon Thomas, Birmingham, Alabama, 2012. Photograph: Courtesy of the artist and Sean Kelly, New York

And: “If representation is a fundamental right in democracy, what is the function of visual representation in that work?”

“It’s a question you can ask over centuries when you think about the inception of citizenship through the Naturalization Act of 1790,” Lewis explains. “Where do you see culture shifting narratives? Who counts and who belongs?”

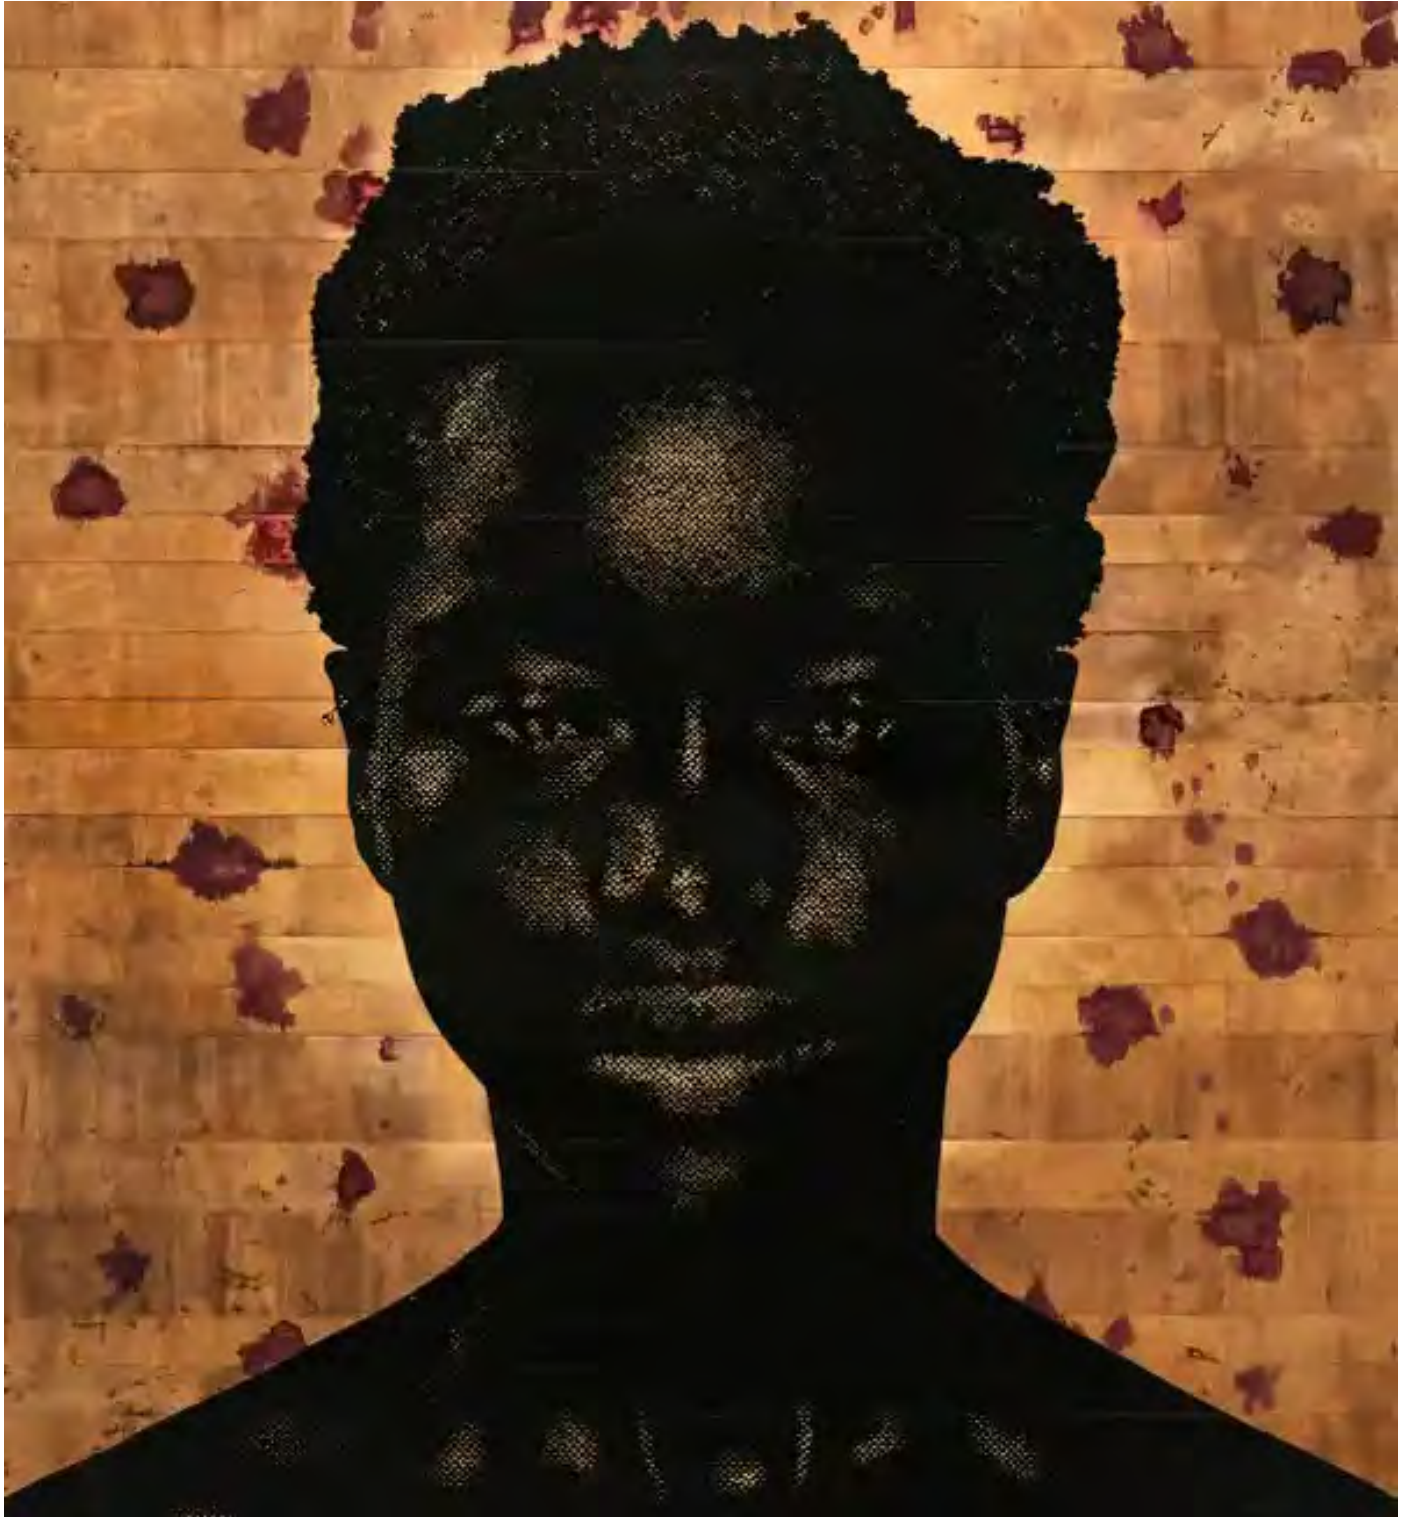

By asking these questions, it points her audience to a set of artworks, events, case studied, history and artistic practices.

“These are fundamental questions I’m asking students, and it’s a fundamental question to the Vision & Justice Project,” said Lewis. “And now at Frieze art fair through the tribute effect.”

She isn’t the curator of the fair but part of an overarching theme. “What interested me was seeing what galleries themselves would offer in response to this prompt to engage with the Vision & Justice Project,” said Lewis. “What you have on display is precisely that. I think that’s a better snapshot of our current moment in cultural history.”

David Zwirner gallery’s booth is showing artworks by Stan Douglas, whose Penn Station’s Half Century project illustrates the liberation of Angelo Herndon, a black coal miner and social activist for workers' rights, who was arrested for possession of communist literature in the 1930s. He wrote a book at the age of 24 called Let Me Live.

▲ Alexis Peskine - Sequita, 2020. Photograph: Courtesy of October Gallery

London art gallery Tiwani Contemporary is hosting a zoom discussion between artist Dawit L Petros and academic Teresa Fiore on the topic of Italy's historic relationship with Africa.

The New Museum features a curatorial video tour of their current exhibition, Grief and Grievance: Art and Mourning in America, while the Museum of Modern Art's Forum on Contemporary Photography pays tribute to Carrie Mae Weems in a two-hour discussion featuring Thelma Golden, among others, talking about the impact the artist has on contemporary culture.

“Carrie Mae Weems, in her art-making practice, is a 21st-century oracle,” said Lewis. “She makes images we need to see that speak to our common humanity. She shows how artists innovate forms that can go past rational arguments to get us to see our common humanity.”

“This is the first art fair in the midst of a pandemic in the US, it sends an enormous and powerful signal around how we consider the force and advocacy of platforms, going forward,” said Lewis. “Can we use an art fair to gather around with the central questions for our day? I hope that we can. I hope this isn't a one-off. I hope what Loring Randolph has done can hopefully create new models of gatherings in the arts, going forward.”

Smartphones have clearly changed our relationships to images, digital or otherwise. This iteration of Frieze New York invites viewers to step back, slow down and think again about what we see. The takeaway is how we reflect on art.

“It's often a private encounter with something that has aesthetic force that can change your perceptions of the world and the narratives you use to describe it,” said Lewis. “That private encounter usually leads to the public work of justice. And that can happen, even at an art fair.”

Hank Willis Thomas to Exhibit NBA Quilts Ahead of All-Star Game

By Sam Gaskin
Cleveland
17 February 2022

Hank Willis Thomas will show quilts sewn together from NBA jerseys in an exhibition that opens in Cleveland from 17 to 20 February.

The exhibition, which anticipates the NBA All-Star Game on Sunday 20 February, includes six quilts depicting basketball greats and one large-scale stainless steel sculpture.

The quilts portray basketball greats Kobe Bryant, Wilt Chamberlain, Michael Jordan, Shaquille O'Neal, Bill Russel, and Jerry West, whose silhouette was used to create the current NBA logo in 1969.

The Jerry West work, entitled That's Game (2021), was commissioned by the NBA and online sports magazine Bleacher Report last year in celebration of the organisation's 75th anniversary. That work sparked the creation of the other five, which were created independently by Thomas.

The exhibition's sculpture is a large version of the artist's Liberty sculpture, a disembodied arm spinning a basketball on a single finger, which was inspired by a 1986 Life Magazine photograph that showed Harlem Globetrotter Meadowlark Lemon performing the same trick in front of the Statue of Liberty.

Sport and its influence on our identities is a major focus of Thomas's work. In 2017, for instance, he made a series of quilts from soccer jerseys using designs based on warrior flags made by Ghana's Fante people in response to the arrival of Europeans.

OCULA

The exhibition's title, The New Black Aesthetic, comes from a 1989 essay by Trey Ellis, who described the emergence of a new cultural identity informed by the success of African American athletes, artists, and academics.

The The New Black Aesthetic exhibition will be held at the Caxton Building, just three blocks from Rocket Mortgage FieldHouse where the All-Star Game will be played. —[O]

Sewn together from NBA jerseys, the quilts portray Kobe Bryant, Wilt Chamberlain, Michael Jordan, Shaquille O'Neal, Bill Russel, and Jerry West.

Hank Willis Thomas, No. 8 (2021). Mixed media including NBA jerseys. Courtesy of the artist. Photograph: Erika Kapin.

OCULA

Hank Willis Thomas, No. 13 (2021). Mixed media including NBA jerseys. Courtesy of the artist. Photograph: Erika Kapin.

OPINION

REDESIGNING AMERICA'S FLAG

Six New Takes on Old Glory

This essay is part of “Snap Out of it, Americal,” a series exploring bold ideas to revitalize and renew the American experiment.

The American flag is a potent piece of national iconography, but its design shifted frequently until the early 1900s. What if it were redesigned today? We asked artists and graphic designers to try. The flags they came up with reflect a mix of approaches. Some are functional designs, others artistic renderings; some represent America as it could be, others how the artist sees the country now.

Hank Willis Thomas
“Lift Every Voice and Sing”
Black lives matter
Don’t tread on me
In God we trust
A thin blue line
Under God, our vindicator
Keep America great
Progress pride

SEPTEMBER 23, 2021

Monumental Tour features sculptures examining themes from Black history

Four temporary art installations can be found throughout Center City through January

BY HANNAH KANIK
PhillyVoice Staff

The traveling Monumental Tour landed in Philadelphia this week, bringing art that honors African American history to iconic landmarks across the city.

Sculptures from Arthur Jafa, Coby Kennedy, Christopher Myers and Hank Willis Thomas will be on display until Jan. 31 at four locations near the Benjamin Franklin Parkway and Delaware River waterfront.

Kindred Arts, the tour organizers, said the works examine themes of colonization, oppression, privilege, Black middle-class labor and Black pride.

The sculptures delve into various aspects of the African American experience, "from the first slaves brought over in the 16th century to the present-day prison pipeline, and the struggle of liberation in between," according to a press release.

Philadelphia is the sixth stop on the nationwide tour, but this marks the first time that the four sculptures are being displayed at the same time.

The tour also will showcase Julian Francis Abele, Philadelphia's first African American architect who helped design iconic buildings like The Philadelphia Museum of Art.

Michael Spain, director of education at the Center for Architecture and Design, will host a walking audio tour through all of the featured sculptures.

Here is a look at the featured sculptures:

COURTESY/ALBERT YEE

'All Power to All People,' by Hank Willis Thomas is located on Eakins Oval, near the Philadelphia Museum of Art.

"All Power to All People"

Hank Willis Thomas' sculpture, "All Power to All People," is a 28-foot tall Afro pick with the Black Power salute emerging from the handle. Its title is a reference to the Black Panther Party slogan.

Thomas, a conceptual artist, said the piece is a symbol of community, strength, perseverance, comradeship and belonging. He has had work exhibited across the country and abroad.

The sculpture is on display at Eakins Oval, 2451 Benjamin Franklin Parkway.

Traveling 'Monumental Tour' brings art to four iconic Philly spots

By Ximena Conde · September 21, 2021

 Hank Willis Thomas's "All Power to All People" stands 28 feet tall and weighs 24,000lbs. It is installed in Eakins Oval as part of the Monumental Tour, made up of four large sculptures installed in celebrated public places. (Albert Yee/Kindred Arts)

A touring exhibition designed to challenge colonial ideas of power, community, and incarceration has landed in Philadelphia, bringing four art pieces to some of the city's most prominent public spaces.

The pieces that make up the "Monumental Tour" have rotated through New York City, Atlanta, Chicago, and other cities. The traveling art aims to affirm people across Philadelphia's diverse communities while creating spaces where those willing can learn about other lived experiences. This is the project's second stop in Philadelphia.

📷 Kindred Arts Director Marsha Reid, who curated Monumental Tour, speaks at the unveiling of Hank Willis Thomas's "All Power to All People" on Eakins Oval. (Emma Lee/WHYY)

Familiar to the city will be a 28-foot-tall Afro pick with raised fist capping the handle. A symbol of “community, strength, perseverance, comradeship, and belonging,” the pick sits on the base of the Benjamin Franklin Parkway with the Art Museum as the backdrop. Named “All Power to All People,” the sculpture by artist Hank Willis Thomas was first seen in 2017 as part of the Monument Lab project.

Parks and Rec unveiled its Parkway installation Tuesday. It brought a jolt of new energy to a historic space steeped in old ideas of institutional power and now undergoing a long-awaited reinvention.

Commissioner of Philadelphia Parks and Recreation Kathryn Ott Lovell said it's only fitting to have “All Power to All People” on the parkway as the department tries to make it a vehicle for community building and civic expression. The exhibit is a reminder art should enhance the aesthetic of shared spaces, while challenging previously held assumptions, said Ott Lovell.

Nerman Family Members 'Get Joy' Sharing Work By Artists Of Color In Kansas City Art Institute Exhibit

KCUR | By Anne Kniggendorf

Published September 18, 2021 at 5:45 AM CDT

Hank Willis Thomas' "Refusal" uses reflective vinyl which changes the image depending on the light.

A never-before-seen collection of work featuring artists of color collected by the Nerman family is showing at KCAI's gallery through October 17.

The Nerman family adopted an unusual modus operandi years ago: search, secure, and share. They're a family of art collectors, starting with the late Jerry and Margaret who began the tradition before World War II, and Lewis and Sue leading the way now.

"I get joy when we acquire the work, but I also get an equal amount of joy in sharing. I really do," Lewis Nerman says.

They're the Nermans of the Nerman Museum of Contemporary Art at Johnson County Community College.

Nerman Museum Of Contemporary Art

From left: Lewis, Sue, Margaret, and Jerry Nerman at the Nerman Museum of Contemporary Art.

For them, art collecting is partly about the search, the thrill of the hunt; Lewis and Sue have collected hundreds of disparate pieces from all over the world during the course of their lives, and now they are responsible for the elder Nermans' collection as well. When asked, they declined to answer how many works in total.

Prior to Jerry Nerman's deployment to France during World War II, he and Margaret hung art from old calendars on their walls. During the war, he mailed home street art, which has been lost to time. Once they had the means from founding and successfully running Arrow Truck Sales, the elder Nermans began to collect in earnest, teaching their children about the thrill.

But just as thrilling as the hunt is sharing the work.

The joy of sharing

Most often, the sharing has taken the form of opening their home to art enthusiasts or loaning pieces to galleries nationally and internationally. Currently, three pieces from their personal collection are on loan to the Whitney Museum of American Art and the Philadelphia Museum of Art which are simultaneously staging a retrospective on Jasper Johns.

But what the Nermans have not done until now is publicly show a curated portion of their collection. Through October 17, the Kansas City Art Institute Gallery is displaying "All Things Being Equal," 16 featured works by 12 artists.

"Pain and Privilege" 1-4 by Harold Smith is on display at the KCAI Gallery.

Sue and Lewis Nerman thought of the title themselves, then collaborated with curator and gallery director Michael Schonhoff to figure out which pieces to include.

Once the couple decided to show works by artists of color, titling it was easy.

Sue says, "We mean that no matter who the artist is, there's no difference between art by artists of color and art by artists of anything."

Lewis jumps in to clarify and says, "When you walk in our home, you see Jasper Johns, and you see [Robert] Rauschenberg, and you see Chuck Close and all these very famous people. And then hanging next to those pieces are these pieces that are in this show."

Curator Michael Schonhoff with one of Nick Cave's Soundsuits.

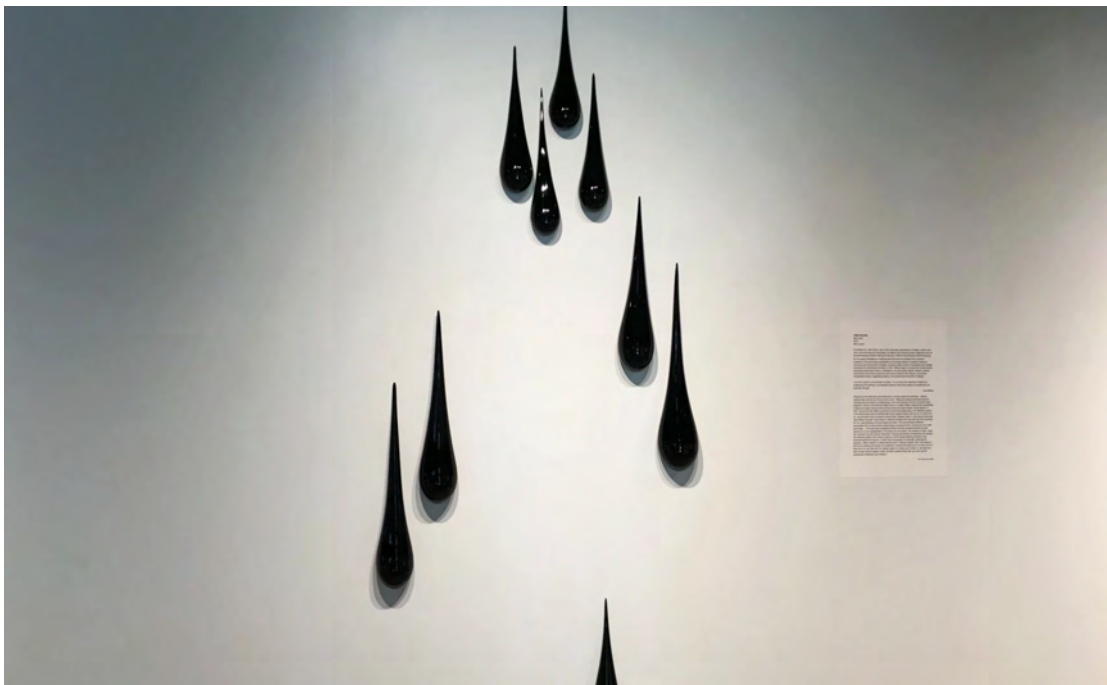

The 12 artists featured are formidable and include Nick Cave, Kerry James Marshall, Hank Willis and Fred Wilson.

"Works by artists of color or any underrepresented group, we can't show enough," Schonhoff says. "I think there's so much work to do there. And I think this builds on momentum, both what's happening at the school, locally, regionally, nationally, that sort of thing."

One of the newest pieces in the Nerman collection is Fred Wilson's 2019 "Black Rain."

Schonhoff explains that Wilson gained fame by looking at cultural objects, especially as part of the Black experience, and "reframing history and positioning them all in a different way, looking at colonialism, looking at slavery. It was never done before in a museum, and it just really kind of turned upside down what collections are and how we look at them."

Schonhoff says that Wilson created a new narrative with objects that people weren't used to seeing.

"Black Rain" by Fred Wilson is showing at the KCAI Gallery through Oct. 17.

"Black Rain" is a continuation of that line of thinking, and though it's more "poetic," as Schonhoff says, than some of Wilson's previous work, the idea is the same: encourage viewers to extrapolate meaning based on their own experiences, the context of the show, or however else they might contextualize it in their own lives.

He says, "I think each one of those pieces holds up very nicely by those particular artists. Each one has its own unique message. I hope people come and see it and enjoy it as much as we do."

Correction: Michael Schonhoff's name was spelled incorrectly in an earlier version of this story.

"All Things Being Equal: Selections from the Nerman Collection" at the Kansas City Art Institute Gallery through Sunday, October 17 at 4415 Warwick Blvd, Kansas City, MO 64111. Free and open to the public with registration.

Getting Soccer Fans Into Art? That's the Goal.

A new gallery at the stadium of Tottenham Hotspur, a top London club, is presenting contemporary works to visitors, with mixed results.

By Alex Marshall

Aug. 16, 2021

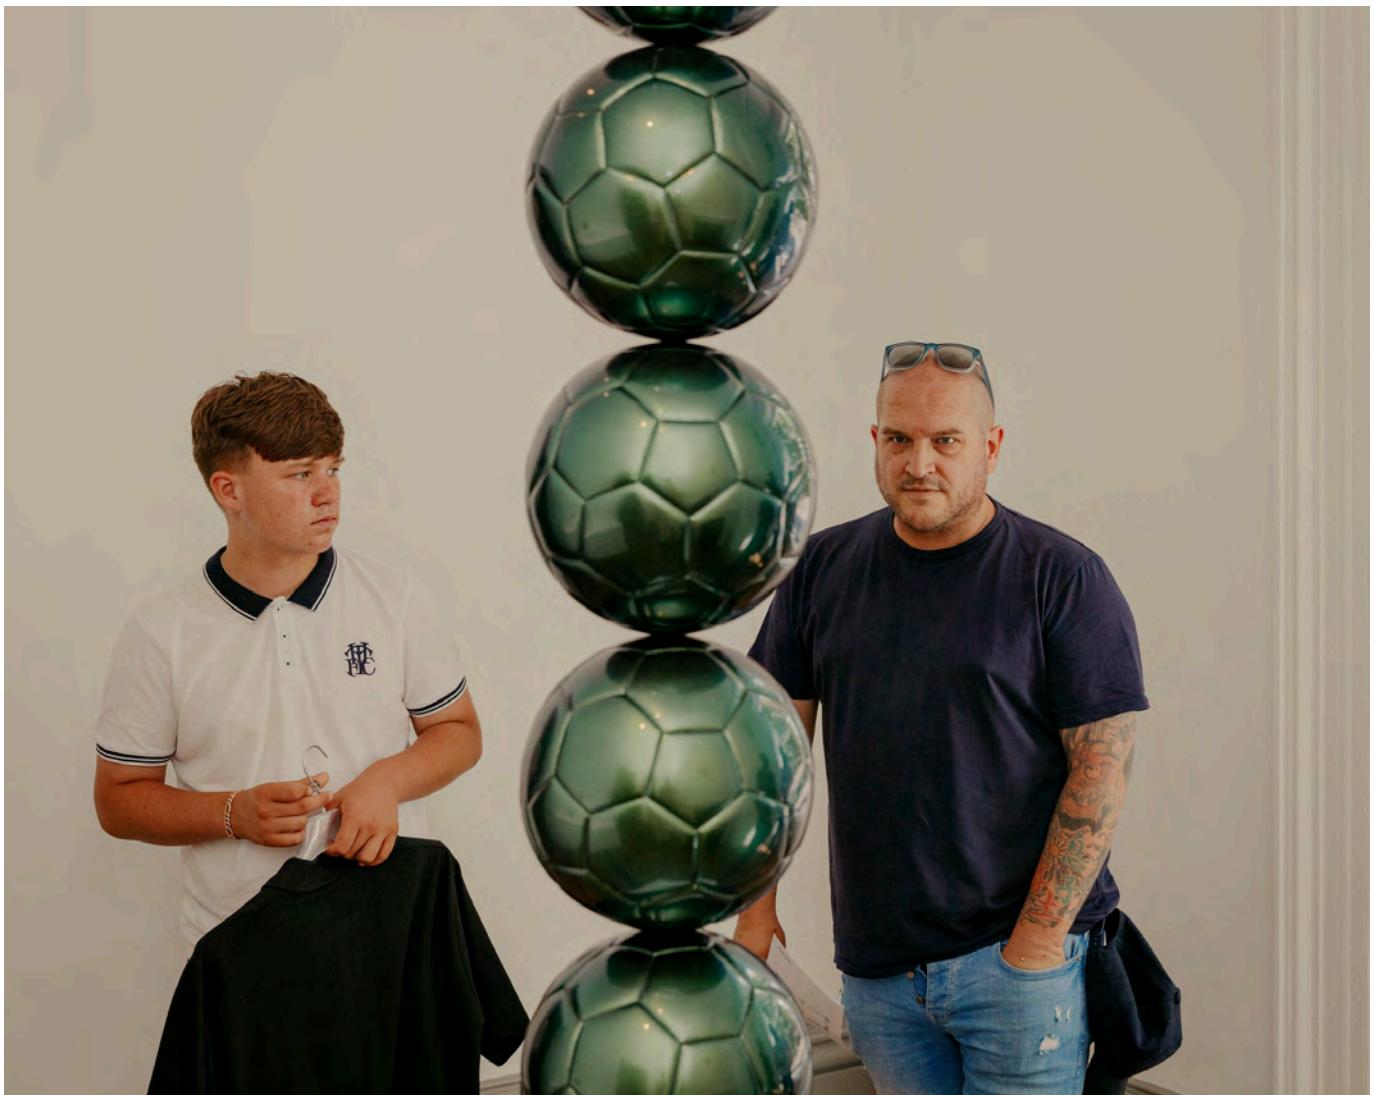

LONDON — Annie Lawrence, 8, was looking excited on Sunday afternoon. She was about to see Tottenham Hotspur, the soccer team she supports, play its first game of the English Premier League season — but her exhilaration wasn't entirely because of the impending game.

Lawrence was standing in OOF, a gallery dedicated to art about soccer that opened last month in a building attached to the club's stadium gift shop. Some of the works on display seemed to be making her as happy as a Tottenham win.

OOF's opening show, "Balls" (until Nov. 21) features 17 pieces of contemporary art made using soccer balls, or representing them. There's one made out of concrete, and another in silicon that looks like it's covered in nipples.

Pointing at a huge bronze of a deflated ball by Marcus Harvey, Lawrence said, "I'd like that one in my bedroom." The artist said in a phone interview that the work might evoke anything from Britain's decline as an imperial power to the end of childhood.

Yet for Lawrence, its appeal was simpler: "It looks like you could sit in it, like a couch," she said.

"Endless Column III," a 2017 work by Hank Willis Thomas, on display in the exhibition space, which is called OOF. Alex Ingram for The New York Times

Fans making their way to Tottenham Hotspur's stadium on Sunday for the club's first match of the English Premier League season. Alex Ingram for The New York Times

The futuristic Tottenham Hotspur stadium viewed from a window of the gallery. Alex Ingram for The New York Times

Annie Lawrence, 8, posing in front of one of her favorite works in the show: "Kipple #2" by Dominic Watson. Alex Ingram for The New York Times

Lawrence then took her father upstairs and looked at a piece called “The Longest Ball in the World,” by the French artist Laurent Perbos. “It’s looks like a sausage!” she said, before grinning for photos in front of another piece that features a papier-mâché soccer ball rotating in a microwave.

Not everyone was so enthusiastic about the works on display. Downstairs, Ron Iley, 71, looked at the ball covered in nipples by the Argentine artist Nicola Costantino. “Load of rubbish,” he said, then walked out.

The worlds of art and soccer don’t necessarily mix. The most well-known recent work to combine both is a bust of Cristiano Ronaldo, the Portuguese player, that made headlines when it was unveiled in 2017 because it looked nothing like him. Other pieces, like Andy Warhol’s acrylic silk-screens of Pelé, are little more than simple tributes to great sportsmen.

Eddy Frankel, an art critic who founded OOF with the gallerists Jennie and Justin Hammond, said he wanted to show that art about football, as soccer is known in Britain, can be exciting, complex and thought-provoking. “We’re using football to express ideas about society,” Frankel said. “If you want to talk about racism, bigotry, homophobia, or if you want to talk community and belief and passion: All of that, you can with football.”

A visitor photographs Nicola Costantino's “Male Nipples Soccer Ball, Chocolate and Peach.” Alex Ingram for The New York Times

Frankel said he used to keep his passion for soccer quiet in Britain’s art world, since “you can’t really get away with being into both.” That changed one night, in 2015, when he was at Sotheby’s to report on an auction of a monumental painting by Gerhard Richter, the German painter. The sale clashed with a game featuring Tottenham Hotspur, the club Frankel supports, so he started watching the match on his phone. Soon, about 15 people behind him were leaning over to get a view, he said.

“I just went, ‘Oh, so there are people who care about football in the art world like I do,” Frankel said.

In 2018 he launched OOF as a magazine that explored the intersection of his passions. “We thought we’d maybe get away with four issues,” he said. The biannual magazine is now on issue eight.

Setting up an exhibition space seemed the logical next step, Frankel said, adding that he initially wanted to open it in a former kebab shop near Tottenham Hotspur’s stadium, which is in an area about eight miles north of London’s traditional gallery districts. But when he and his partners approached the local council for help, they suggested contacting the club instead, which offered a 19th century townhouse that sits incongruously outside the club’s futuristic stadium and is attached to its gift shop.

Most of the works on display at OOF are for sale, with some pieces worth up to $120,000, yet the gallery has a much higher footfall than most commercial galleries. More than 60,000 fans come to the stadium on game days, and on Sunday, a few hundred spectators peeled off from the crowds for a look around, many dressed in Tottenham Hotspur’s uniform.

OOF is located in a 19th-century townhouse owned by the club that can be reached via the stadium gift shop. Alex Ingram for The New York Times

Abigail Lane's "Self-Portrait as a Pheasant" is made from a football, bird wings, oil paint, painted wood and glass. Alex Ingram for The New York Times

"We're basically running a museum, without a museum budget," Frankel said.

A tongue-in-cheek sign at the entrance asks visitors not to kick the art, but not everyone had complied, Frankel said: On a recent visit, Ledley King, a former Tottenham Hotspur captain, had given "The Longest Ball in the World" a light boot.

Pebros, the artist behind the work, laughed when told about the incident in a telephone interview. "Maybe he doesn't go to many galleries, so he didn't know," he said.

The current squad, including its famed striker Harry Kane, had not yet been to visit the gallery, Frankel said. The players were trying to keep social interactions to a minimum during the pandemic.

"Obviously, we're a commercial gallery so it'd be nice to sell some art," Frankel said. "But the real success is if we can get loads of people through the door, and get them to engage in contemporary art, who normally wouldn't," he added.

Many of the several hundred visitors on Sunday fit that bill. "We don't go to galleries if we're honest," said Hannah Barnato, 27, there with her partner. "But it's interesting. It's different," she said.

Sam Rabin, one of three guides in the gallery who talk the fans through the works, said that was a common reaction. "I've never heard the phrase, 'It's different,' more than I have working here," he said.

But many visitors, especially children, showed a deep connection with the art on display, he said, adding that this proved soccer and art were not the separate worlds they might seem. "They're both emotional experiences," he said. "They're both worthwhile experiences."

An Open Letter Signed by Hank Willis Thomas Asks the U.S. to Take in Afghan Artists

By Helen Holmes · 08/25/21 10:52am

A Taliban fighter walks past a beauty salon in Kabul on August 18, 2021. WAKIL KOHSAR/AFP via Getty Images

In the wake of reports that the Taliban has unilaterally taken over Afghanistan, prompting thousands of people to desperately attempt to leave the country and sparking dire worries about Afghanistan's cultural heritage, over 350 artists and cultural figures have signed an open letter imploring the United States to make moves to protect Afghan creatives. Published on Tuesday, the letter, which was put together by the Arts for Afghanistan group, has been signed by luminaries including Hank Willis Thomas, Susan Meiselas, Naeem Mohaiemen, Walid Raad, Michael Rakowitz and Coco Fusco. The document also includes suggestions in terms of concrete steps American officials can take in order to "facilitate the departure from Afghanistan of at-risk Afghans, and to include artists, filmmakers, performers, and writers in that category."

For example, the letter suggests that the US government "immediately include cultural workers in the categories being used to refer at-risk Afghans for evacuation lists," and "keep the Kabul airport open until all at-risk Afghans who wish to evacuate have done so, and allow chartered, commercial, and humanitarian flights to operate out of the airport under the protection of the US."

"Even before the Taliban's takeover, cultural workers took grave risks in depicting the experiences and articulating the aspirations of Afghans, with the encouragement—and, often, direct support—of the US government," the letter reads. "Now, the vocation of truth-telling has become much more dangerous, and many of our peers see no choice but to leave the country."

Indeed, Afghans and other cultural commentators alike have already expressed concern that Afghanistan's new regime could negatively impact cultural artifacts and cultural workers. "We're all waiting to see what the general position is going to be," Bastien Varoutsikos, the director of an organization that digitizes vulnerable heritage sites, told The Art Newspaper recently. "From a political standpoint, it's unclear if the Taliban will engage in destructions of high value heritage landmarks considering the new narrative they're attempting to build."

ARTFORUM

Demonstrators in Rotterdam rally on behalf of Afghans protesting and fleeing the Taliban. Photo: Donald Trung Quoc Don/Wikipedia Commons.
August 25, 2021 at 5:16pm

HUNDREDS OF ARTISTS SIGN OPEN LETTER CALLING FOR US TO OFFER ASYLUM TO AFGHAN CULTURE WORKERS

More than 350 cultural workers including artists Coco Fusco, Joyce Kozloff, Susan Meiselas, Naeem Mohaiemen, Walid Raad, Michael Rakowitz, Martha Rosler, Hank Willis Thomas, Cecilia Vicuña, and Martha Wilson, as well as writers Teju Cole, Hari Kunzru, Viet Thanh Nguyen, and Lynne Tillman, have lent their signatures to a fiery open letter from Arts for Afghanistan demanding that the US government “do everything in its power” to assist at-risk Afghans fleeing the country in an attempt to escape the newly ascendant Taliban rule. According to the authors of the letter, released August 24, the members of this group—among them artists, curators, writers, filmmakers, and performers—were in a precarious position even before the militant Islamist coalition’s swift rise to power, thanks to their efforts in illuminating Afghans' daily lives and aspirations often with the approval and assistance of the US government, which has now effectively abandoned them.

In the letter, Arts for Afghanistan calls for the US government to expedite visas for cultural workers and drop the stipulation that the visas be processed in a third country. Reaching out to countries beyond the United States, the missive's writers additionally "call on governments of all nations to facilitate the evacuation and resettlement of Afghan refugees by offering asylum and aid," asserting, "We insist on the protection of all who have devoted themselves to fostering free expression and civil society in Afghanistan."

"Art is a proxy for humanity," said Eric Gottesman, a political scientist and one of the letter's coauthors. "As we can see unfolding in real time in Afghanistan and elsewhere around the world, the voices of artists are considered dangerous because they speak truth to power."

Also signing the missive were arts and humanitarian organizations the Authors Guild, CECArtsLink, Creative Capital, For Freedoms, Magnum Foundation, and PEN America, the last of which recently called on the US government to protect its writers in Afghanistan after two Pen Afghanistan members were murdered by the Taliban.

SURFACE

ART

A Memorial to Victims of Gun Violence, Told Through Their Keepsakes

BY RYAN WADDOUPS

April 13, 2021

At the National Building Museum, Hank Willis Thomas and Mass Design Group conceive a house-like memorial that pays tribute to shooting victims through mementos donated by their family members.

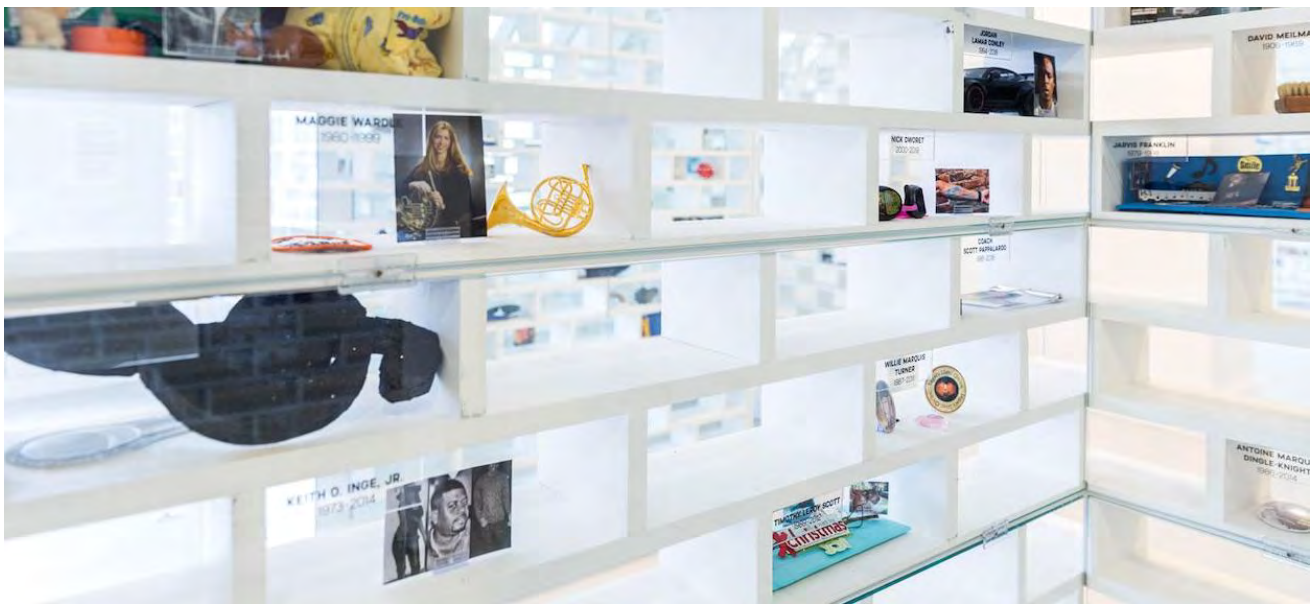

According to the nonprofit research group Gun Violence Archive, nearly 40,000 Americans succumb to gun violence every year—an epidemic of such great magnitude that it often reduces victims to mere statistics. Though many of their stories remain forever untold, some are being permanently enshrined in the Gun Violence Memorial Project, a poignant memorial to victims conceived by the conceptual artist Hank Willis Thomas and Mass Design Group in partnership with gun violence prevention organizations Purpose Over Pain and Everytown for Gun Safety at the National Building Museum in Washington, D.C.

The project “provides a space for people to share their stories and give voice to the human side” of the gun violence crisis, says Michael Murphy, founder of Mass Design Group. It comprises four house-like structures built from 700 glass bricks, referencing the weekly death toll from gun-related violence in the U.S. Each brick contains a remembrance object—photographs, baby shoes, graduation tassels, and prayer books among them—donated by victims’ family members to preserve their individual memories and communicate the enormity of the gun violence crisis in built space. “It’s an ever-changing testimony to love, loss, and life,” continues Murphy. “With each story, the entire memorial changes and grows.” Also featured are excerpts from Comes the Light, a forthcoming documentary directed by Haroula Rose and produced by Caryn Capotosto about the devastating effects of gun violence.

For Thomas, the project takes on an acutely personal touch. “My family felt the effects of gun violence firsthand when my cousin was murdered during a robbery in 2000,” he says of his late relative, Songha, the namesake of the public art practice Songha & Company. “My life, and by extension my artistic practice, has been influenced ever since.”

Thomas previously meditated on the crisis through a monumental sculpture, 14,719 (2018), shown at his mid-career survey at the Portland Art Museum, in which strips of blue fabric reminiscent of the U.S. flag were hand-stitched with one white star for every person nationwide who died from gun violence that year. They descended from the museum’s soaring atrium, creating a chapel of loss that questions the second-amendment patriotism that many mistake for the right to kill. “The most likely way for young African American men to die is by gun violence,” Thomas told the New York Times. “But all you have to be is alive in America and you can fall victim.”

Mass Design Group, a nonprofit Boston-based design collective, has risen to prominence for architectural projects such as hospitals in Rwanda, a cholera treatment center in Haiti, and a “waiting village” for pregnant women in Malawi that advocate for human dignity, social justice, and healing. In 2018, the firm completed the National Memorial for Peace and Justice in Montgomery, Alabama, that honors more than 4,000 victims of racially motivated lynching. For the Gun Violence Memorial Project, the firm strove to “communicate the enormity of the epidemic while also honoring the individuals whose lives have been taken,” says senior associate Jha D. Williams. “The recognizable form of the wood lattice and glass houses are but the framework in which the more intimate narrative is shared; the memorial is the willingness of families to share personal artifacts and stories of their loved ones.

The Gun Violence Memorial Project is being presented alongside “Justice Is Beauty: The Work of Mass Design Group,” a retrospective of the firm’s work, through September 25. It previously appeared at the Chicago Cultural Center during the 2019 Chicago Architecture Biennial, though plans are underway to find a permanent location as a national memorial. Murphy hopes it will mark the “beginning of a multi-year initiative to collect objects from across the country” that will display in 52 houses—a number that symbolizes weeks in a year and the number of U.S. states and territories—on the National Mall. His vision isn’t unlike the NAMES Project’s AIDS Memorial Quilt, which displayed there in 1987. (Julie Rhoad, former president of the NAMES Project Foundation, is now a senior director of Mass Design Group.)

And if you can’t attend in person, check out Everytown’s Moments That Survive, a digital campaign that lets people share their stories and build community among fellow survivors.

(All images courtesy of the National Building Museum)

Arts and Culture

The Monumental Tour Art Exhibition Comes to Englewood.

Danielle Sanders, Interim Managing Editor

June 24, 2021

When people speak of the Englewood neighborhood in Chicago, they rarely mention art, culture, walking trails, or sustainable food. Anton Seals, Co-Founder and Executive Director of Grow, Greater Englewood is working to change that. With the Monumental Tour, an outdoor installation featuring the works of acclaimed artist, Hank Willis Thomas, and Arthur Jafa, Anton Seals hopes this latest project continues to lift and empower the Englewood community.

On display until the end of August, Hank Williams Thomas, “All Power to All People” will be located in Englewood Square at 5801 S. Halsted and Arthur Jafa’s “Big Wheel” will be in Bronzeville at the Blanc Gallery at 4445 S. Martin Luther King Jr., Drive. The Monumental Tour is a national tour that brings iconic monuments across the United States for the purposes of advancing the demand for racial equity.

Hank Willis Thomas’ All Power to All People is a provocative artwork combining the Afro pick and the Black Power salute, both icons of Black identity and empowerment. At approximately 28 feet tall, the work stands as a symbol of community, strength, perseverance, comradeship, and belonging. The sculpture’s title references a legendary Black Panther Party slogan—its arrival to Chicago, where the Illinois chapter of the Black Panther Party was headquartered, is a celebration of Chicago’s contribution to civic engagement and the advancement of social justice. All Power to All People is illustrative of the artist’s longstanding investigation into the role public art plays in shaping collective discourse and societal values.

“Art has always been the dialogue of revolution, pushing urgent issues to the forefront of culture,” said Marsha Reid, Director of Kindred Arts. “We believe these monumental symbols of identity and empowerment, by Thomas and Jafa, have a critical role to play in our historical moment in time.”

Arthur Jafa’s Big Wheel is a spacious, yearning, and open-ended installation comprising four gargantuan, seven-foot tires originally made for monster trucks. Each is laced with a mesh of iron chain; in lieu of hubcaps, abstract medallion sculptures are 3-D printed from melted chains. Like industrial chakras, they manifest Jafa’s obsession with the culture of monster vehicles that has fascinated him since his Mississippi childhood. The heavy manufacturing evokes America’s economic changes, notably the deindustrialization and transition to the service economy that Jafa’s generation watched unfold and that dashed so many Black middle-class aspirations. The installation features a sound component consisting of a loop of Teddy Pendergrass ballads that emit from floor speakers. The songs are as much an authentic product of late-industrial America as are the tires and gantry.

“Wide Awakes Chicago’s intention is to respect the value of Black spaces by placing the artists’ works directly within the sight of residents from the Bronzeville and Englewood communities,” said Wide Awakes Chicago member, Mario Smith. “The Chicago leg of The Monumental Tour will also spark dialogue and reintroduce some of Chicago’s finest visual artists, DJs, and musicians to the city as we begin to reopen.”

Established in 2014, Grow Greater Englewood works to build a community in which all people can live safe, happy, healthy, and fulfilling lives, now and into the future. Grow Greater Englewood is a social enterprise that works with residents and developers to create sustainable, food economies and green businesses to empower residents to create wellness and wealth. Anton Seals spoke about the importance of the Monumental Tour in the Englewood community saying, “when this opportunity came, we wanted to be able to toy with this notion of what does it mean, to have black spaces. So, this becomes an opportunity. We started in the farmers market there on Halsted, which used to be a big vacant lot. There is beauty in our own community, and we just do not want to talk about it, we must demonstrate it. In addition, we have a farm, we are building with Chicago architecture biennial site as well. There will be a plaza area that we are in the middle of constructing that will be on the other side near Halsted. So, there is a lot that is going to be synergized. We thought this all power to all people would be a good conversation starter for drawing attention to what does it mean to have black spaces”?

He continued saying, “with the Monumental Tour just having these black artists of note display their pieces in our communities, that is significant. These artists sell their pieces for millions of dollars, and they are on display around the world but for them, they said, yeah that is nice but what does that do for the black aesthetic? That is our responsibility, but it is also a mirror back to the community. What is it that we really want and what is already here and how do we connect those dots? That is where people who are weavers, like me, come in. I am a weaver. I am a leader, but I am also a weaver. I like to weave and bring and create platforms for others and institutions because that is the only way that we are going to survive”.

Featured in Issue 219

How Artists Are Re-Imagining Basketball

Kevin Beasley, Suzanne McClelland and Hank Willis Thomas use sports jerseys to consider the game's politics of gender, race and class

E BY EMILY STAMEY IN PROFILES | 28 APR 21

Although invented in 1891, basketball only became a widespread cultural obsession in the US in the 1980s and '90s with the rise of cable television. The game's fast pace and visual dynamism appealed to fans watching from home, while its accessibility meant they could easily play scrimmage at the park or in their driveways. In turn, multi-billion-dollar team franchises leveraged the star power of their players for elaborate promotions and branded apparel: this was the era of Nike's Air Jordan sneakers and films such as He Got Game (1998). As a phenomenon that transcends sport and touches pop culture from film to fashion, basketball appears in the work of a number of contemporary artists, who treat it as emblematic of American society and, in particular, its dynamics of race and gender. Kevin Beasley, Suzanne McClelland and Hank Willis Thomas all incorporate basketball jerseys into their work as signifiers of the game and the individuals – especially women and people of colour – who might find their own stories reflected in it.

Hank Willis Thomas, South Bend, 2012. Courtesy: the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York

Comprising more than a dozen women's jerseys, McClelland's slyly titled Well Hung (2004) pays tribute to the early accomplishments of the US Women's National Basketball Association. When she completed the piece, the organization was less than a decade old but had already expanded to 13 teams and attracted more than 50 million fans. Yet, as McClelland told me when I spoke to her about the work, on visiting the NBA flagship store in New York, she found that 'women's jerseys were relegated to one messy circular display rack near the bathrooms in the basement'. Well Hung, in contrast, is triumphant: embellished with pearls, sequins and feathers, the jerseys form a raucous celebration banner.

Rather than sewing her jerseys together, McClelland fastened them with safety pins and bows. Those fragile ties refer to the work's political context: in the wake of the 2003 US invasion of Iraq, McClelland considered both the military and sporting connotations of the term 'draft'. Drafted soldiers' service is compulsory, but all they know is that they will be fighting for their country. Drafted sports players' participation is voluntary, but they do not know for which team they will ultimately play. Team cohesion in both circumstances can be mentally and emotionally tenuous; bonds can be severed as soldiers are sent to new assignments or players traded elsewhere. Of course, both soldiers and players also wear uniforms to reinforce their collective identity. In her pinned and tied-together assemblage of jerseys from different teams, McClelland underscores both the power and fragility of such unions.

Although likewise constructed of jerseys, Thomas's South Bend (2012) represents Division 1 schools: the powerhouses of intercollegiate athletics in the US. While McClelland's jerseys extend horizontally, like so many players lined up for a team photo, Thomas's composition is decidedly singular, its vertical span of 1.9 metres akin to the height of a player. Geometric segments cut from jerseys are sewn together, leaving a fractured central motif of half-square triangles, known among quilters as the 'broken dishes' pattern. According to some historical accounts, this design was hung from windows as a signal to guide escaped slaves to freedom along the Underground Railroad.

Throughout his practice, Thomas draws parallels between the commodification of Black bodies in slavery and in professional sports. In his 2016 essay, 'What Goes without Saying', he notes with unease: 'For so many African American men [...] the idea of ascending is chained to ascending through sports and entertainment.' With that in mind, South Bend reads as a warning to Black men not to see their path to success as limited to sports. Thomas's poignant use of college jerseys evokes the unpaid labour of student athletes, the majority of them Black, in those programmes that generate millions of dollars for their universities. Notably, in Thomas's assemblage of jersey fragments, the players' names are absent, giving the impression of so many interchangeable bodies as mere cogs in a money-making machine.

Repetition likewise plays an essential role in Beasley's Harden (2017), albeit to different formal effect. The imposing artwork comprises a panel of burgundy acoustic foam covered in multiple jerseys with the name and number of star player James Harden, then with the Houston Rockets. Split along their sides and stretched out so that both front and back are simultaneously visible, the jerseys can be read as a makeshift bandage or a joint effort to protect the form beneath. This distention, coupled with the jerseys' bloody hue, could also be interpreted as the aftermath of a physical conflict. As with the work's shapes and colours, Beasley's title invites multiple interpretations. 'Harden', when taken as a word rather than a proper name, underscores the literal rigidity of the jerseys, which are sealed in polyurethane resin. It also has an emotional tenor, evoking the hardening of one's resolve in a fight or, even, of the heart against pain. In the wake of the 2020 protests for racial justice, Harden retrospectively might be seen as a call for collective resolve.

That tension of unity in the face of division defines basketball itself, a game played by opposing teams. Deploying the sport's broad cultural appeal, Beasley, McClelland and Thomas create works at once familiar and unsettling, asking us to consider the ways we must come together despite the fractures that keep us apart.

A woman with dark, curly hair and a serious expression is the central figure. She is wearing a short-sleeved shirt with horizontal blue and white stripes and thin pink lines. Her accessories include large hoop earrings, a necklace with a small pendant, and a long chain with a cross. She holds a small yellow object between her fingers of her right hand. The background features a modern building with a grid of large glass windows and a street with parked cars.

By Osman Can Yerekeban Monday 2 November, 2020

On 3 October, thousands marched through Manhattan, slicing the island all the way from Harlem through Downtown, in colourful capes, make-up, and accessories. It was a beautiful fall day, an afternoon of joy and pride, manifested in colours, music, and one united slogan. They were the 'Wide Awakes', a vibrant network of artists, musicians, social workers, community organisers, educators, and healthcare operators. Stilt walkers on towering poles, breakdancers and chorus singers all took to Manhattan's wide streets to fight injustice and call for action before the presidential election.

At the crowd's forefront was artist Hank Willis Thomas, waving a flag decorated with a large eye fully open – widely awake – in his black oilcloth cape dotted with bright colours. For Freedoms, the art and social justice organisation he cofounded with fellow artist Eric Gottesman, was an organiser of the march, where the energy in the eyes radiated over every mask. Thomas is an artist who continuously asks what emancipation in the 21st century means and looks like, and there he was spearheading a movement that adopts its name and mission with a group of 19th-century abolitionists. 'We have to radically imagine the world that we want to live in for it to exist,' he had told me before the march. 'We can learn from the past, study the past, yet also not fall as a way to avoid the traps.'

The art world has always established its own vanguards, but Thomas, in recent years, has been a particular mastery of social activism. This has been embodied through art in all forms, from billboards on highways to projections over government buildings. He has been crafting ways of social engagement and community action against structural inequalities, as well as the increasing acts of racially charged police brutality. If art-making is foremost a gesture, Thomas' has been defined by activism, a dedication prompted by the nation's precarious profile of social justice. 'Race, colonialism, capitalism and industrialisation are finite games, designed to create boxes for limitation and scarcity,' he says. 'The infinite game is about abundance.' Hope will lie in the core of his practice, and he believes in the power of change through alliance.

During the 2018 midterm elections, For Freedoms launched its 50 States, 50 Billboards project to bring attention-calling billboards to every American state, each designed by an artist with support from 2,221 Kickstarter backers. Proving museums can go beyond exhibiting art, Thomas and his team collaborated with 220 institutions across the country to support the billboards' mission with town hall meetings. Local communities came together with artists, scholars and activists for think-tanks on how democracy and freedom could walk hand in hand.

From marches attended by thousands to town hall meetings, Thomas' invitation has been an open one to join the discussion, a get-together of all voices to talk and listen. 'I don't tend to subscribe to ideas about division. I understand race as a fabrication designed to divide and conquer,' he says. 'Race is in your tongue the moment you open your mouth. You've been classified and racialised to demoralise you or make you feel better.' He believes in the power of speech where everyone has equal entitlement to a voice. And he's committed to carve that space, be it making a larger-than-life speech bubble sculpture for anyone to jump inside to speak up, or projecting testimonies from inmates onto the U.S. Department of Justice in Washington or the Manhattan Detention Center.

ABSOLUT POWER.

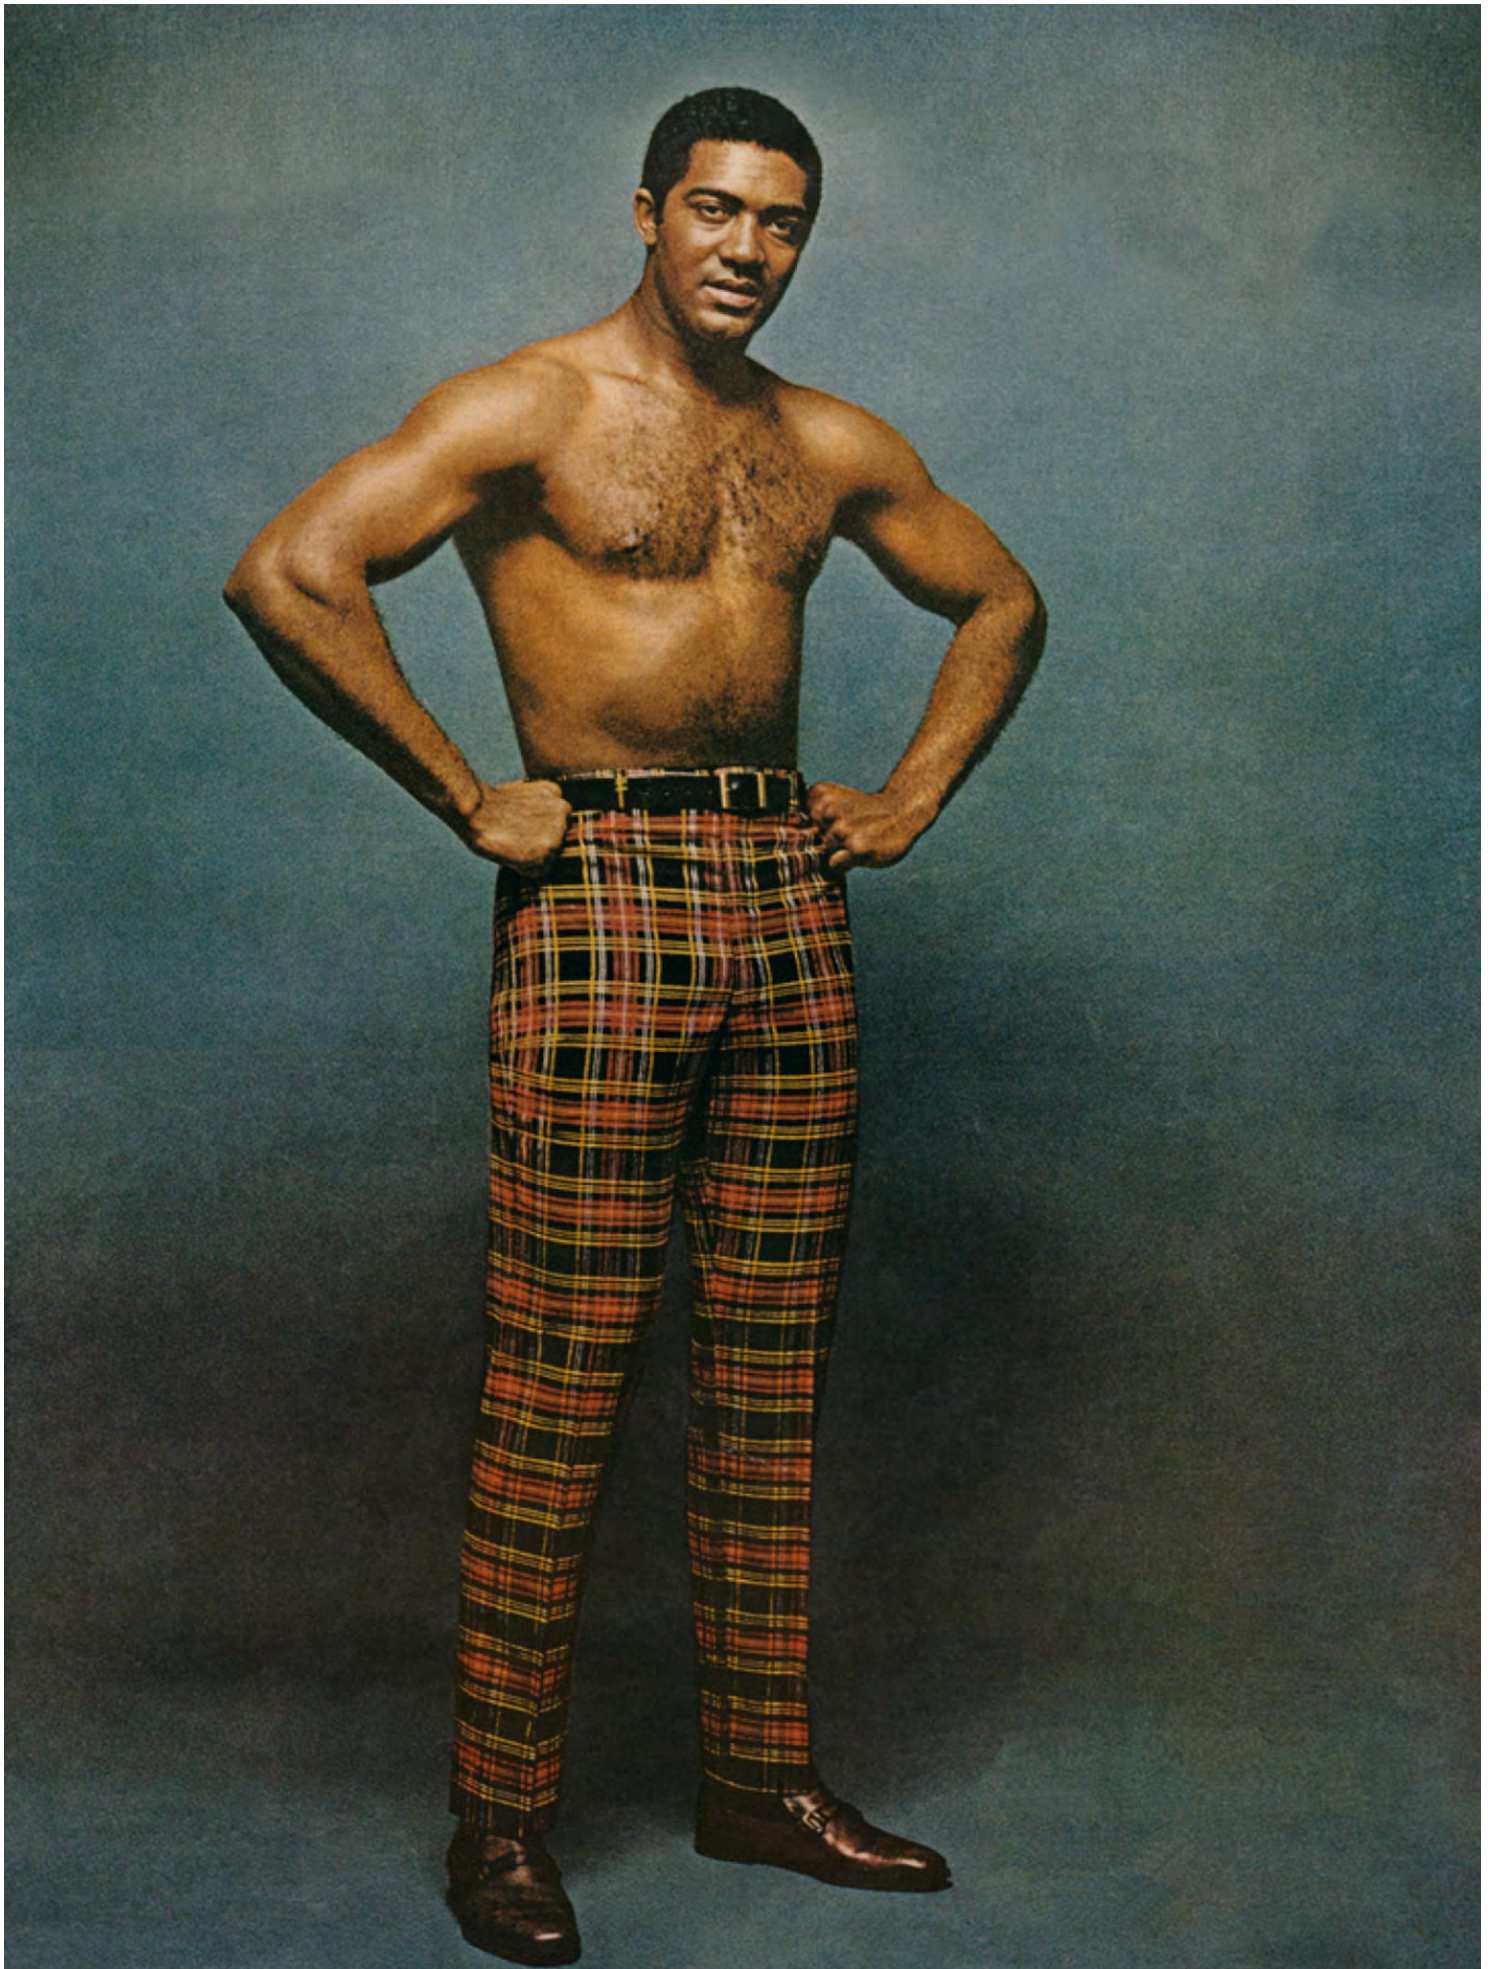

'The idea in the USA of building a perfect union suggests both its failure, desire and necessity always to improve it'

Thomas' investment in social change goes beyond museum walls. For over a decade, he has been playfully revealing how visual languages of popular culture, advertising and media shape, chronicle and institutionalise racial bias. He handles visual, local, historical and institutionally rooted aesthetics through fibreglass, bronze, steel sculptures or photographs, which manipulate society's fixed notions on class and power.

A currently travelling mid-career survey of his work, which kicked off last year at the Portland Museum of Art and has recently opened at the Cincinnati Art Museum, is titled All Things Being Equal..., aptly left with an ellipsis. The answer to why the title is kept open-ended is evident in the works. 'Absolut No Return' (2008) manipulates the image of a doorway in a slave house in Goree Island, Senegal, which led the enslaved onto ships that set sail to the New World. The doorway here resembles the recognisable shape of a bottle of Absolut Vodka. In an earlier version, titled Absolut Power (2003), the vodka bottle is the slave ship, in which innumerable dark-skinned bodies lie stacked inside. According to Thomas, the work communicates 'how a simple idea about someone else can enable others to take horrific action in the name of commerce.' Similar to other 90-plus works on view, this image reflects on our purpose by heralding the work of our ancestors who kept our species alive before we created industrialisation.

With his sculptures, the artist repositions the familiar into the uncanny and provides his audience with the tools to become voluntary thinkers and activists, capable of achieving their own political and social envisioning for a just new world. His monumental travelling sculpture, 'All Power To All People', is presented by Kindred Arts and marks the journey of a 25-foot steel ploy combining a black Afro comb with the Black Power fist salute across various public locations in the US, as divided states await the presidential election in November.

'I'm interested in the iconography of everyday objects,' is Thomas' way of explaining how the oversized beautification tool came to hold court at the Human Rights Campaign headquarters in Washington DC for all to see. The display's closing coincided with the anniversary march commemorating the historic March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom, where Martin Luther King Jr uttered his 1963 'I Have a Dream' speech that changed Black public consciousness forever. Therefore, its significance highlights the artist's concern for assembling citizens and voters among American youth to make use of their democratic rite for good, similar to his mission with the Wide Awakes march. The sculpture, the march, or his overall practice, attest to and recharge Black communities' unwavering ability to persevere, command justice, and rise to worth in areas that have worked to erase them.

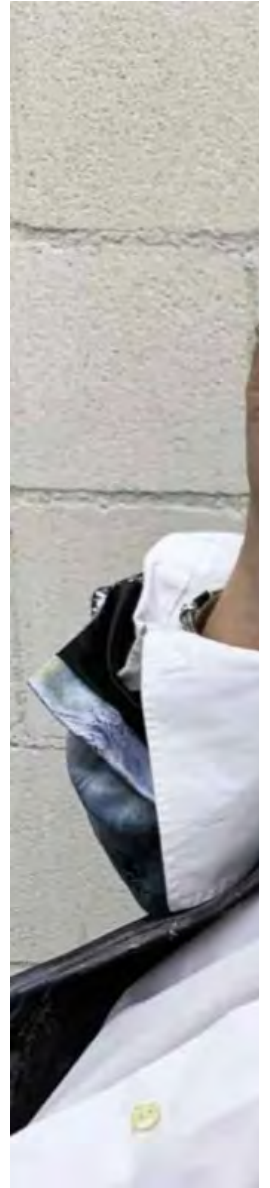

Explore memberships

Members By Members highlights

There's something about Miranda July

Read the story

An afternoon w

Read the story

Terms and policies
Opt out of sale
Personal data request
Careers

Contact
Download phone app
@Instagram

Subscribe

Sign up to hear about events, news and updates from Soho House and our other businesses.

Subscribe

English (US) ▾

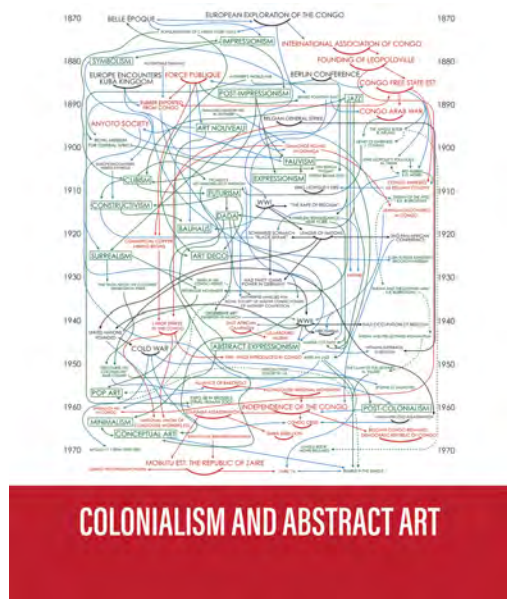

SOHO HOUSE
2020

PHOTO ESSAYS

Hank Willis Thomas Gives an Infamous Modern Art Diagram a Postcolonial Update

The conceptual artist provides a much needed update to Alfred J. Barr, Jr's well-known chart.

Hrag Vartanian October 1, 2020

Hank Willis Thomas, Colonialism and Abstract Art, 2019) (image courtesy the artist)

The 1936 “Cubism and Abstract Art” graphic by the founding director of the Museum of Modern Art (MoMA), Alfred J. Barr, Jr., has become the stuff of legend in art circles. In it, Barr presents a very pared-down history of art that condenses many movements into a teleological chart that reinforces the importance of Cubism and its ilk. Like colonialism itself, this version of history is in service of one thing: justifying the dominance of modern European civilization, even if, as in this case, it is focused on a particular cultural movement.

Artist Hank Willis Thomas has updated the arcane image for his exhibition at Maruani Mercier Gallery in Brussels, Belgium. He's expanded the image to not only bring it forward to the year 1970 but has also incorporated the structural realities of society that Barr consciously ignored. Because of the location of the show, the emphasis is understandably on Belgian history. Some connections may seem obtuse at first, but slowly they make sense, like the connection between copper mining and Art Deco — I mean, all those shiny metals used for streamlined details and forms, as well as radios and electronics, had to come from somewhere, right?

In this image, the power relationships and structural oppression easily mingle with academic art terms, and all together they look like a web of relationships that can be as contradictory and confusing as Barr's chart is simplistic and naive.

Thomas's graphic demonstrates how we can alter myopic visions of art in ways that continue to engage with historical works while not allowing them to eclipse the larger and evolving histories that help us understand our world.

Belgium and Congo were forcibly connected for a century — with one of those nations clearly benefiting at the expense of the other. So, one wonders, what does that mean for art? When we look at a painting by Belgian Surrealist René Magritte should we also consider how Congo factors into his work?

Sep 23, 2020, 01:50pm EDT

Hank Willis Thomas Asks And Answers America's Toughest Questions About Race At Cincinnati Art Museum

Chadd Scott Contributor

Arts

Hank Willis Thomas (American, born 1976), 'The Cotton Bowl', from the series, 'Strange Fruit,' 2011.
IMAGE COURTESY OF THE ARTIST AND JACK SHAINMAN GALLERY, NEW YORK. © HANK WILLIS THOMAS.

Every single one of Hank Willis Thomas' searing artworks on view now at the Cincinnati Art Museum has a "ripped from the headlines" feel. Thomas examines, explores, interrogates and lays bare the Black experience in America with the varying subtlety of a scalpel and a sledgehammer.

Every piece seems to directly address one or more of the tragedies experienced throughout 2020 by America's Black community. Take your pick from the recent police murders of George Floyd, Breonna Taylor and Damien Daniels to the recent police shootings of Willie Henley and Jacob Blake, the modern day lynching of Ahmaud Arbery, the disproportionate burden of Covid-19 deaths, the widening wealth gap, a resurgence in overt, public expressions of white supremacy or a throwback, race-baiting president sent from the Jim Crow-era.

This artwork, however, wasn't inspired by 2020.

These pieces weren't created in 2020.

Hank Willis Thomas: All Things Being Equal... is a retrospective. The almost 100 works on display were created over the past 20 years. Thomas' work reminds us that while millions of new advocates to the equal rights movement have been made in 2020, the traumas which have moved contemporary converts to action are nothing new to those suffering them directly.

The same traumas have been taking place for decades. Generations. Centuries.

"Hank Willis Thomas asks us to see and challenge systems of inequality that are woven into the fabric of contemporary life; he asks us to participate and understand that our participation in a gallery is continuous with participation in the world,” Nathaniel Stein, Associate Curator of Photography at the Cincinnati Art Museum, told Forbes.com. “His work invites us to look at history, be unafraid of the lessons it holds for our future, and—paraphrasing him—listen for the parts of each of us that are in others.”

Hank Willis Thomas (American, born 1976), 'Guernica,' 2016. Mixed media, including sport jerseys, ...
COURTESY OF THE ARTIST AND JACK SHAINMAN GALLERY, NEW YORK. © HANK WILLIS THOMAS.

This show represents the first comprehensive mid-career survey of Thomas' work. Included are early photographic series, sculptures and multi-media works reinterpreting the photographic record of historic twentieth-century events, monumental textile works constructed from reclaimed prison uniforms and athletic jerseys, interactive video installations and public art projects. Twenty years of artistry are encompassed during which Thomas has explored how the visual languages of popular culture, advertising and media shape society and individual perspective, structuring and trading upon notions of race and gender.

“Thomas's work asks us to see and be critical about the roles we play as participants in systems that support inequality, yet it also tells us that the reason for this hard examination is that we have the power to build fuller life together,” Stein said.

“Hard examination.”

Thomas’ work requires it. You won’t find still lifes of peonies or bucolic landscapes here.

Absolut Power recreates the horrors of slave ships inside an Absolute Vodka bottle. The Cotton Bowl, Strange Fruit, Futbol and Chain, Branded Head, Guernica and others expose stomach-churning through lines connecting slavery to the prevalence of African-Americans in sports. Public Enemy (Black and Gold) lives with onlookers long after it has been experienced.

Thomas’ art is a workout.

It’s also necessary.

Necessary considering how millions of Americans continue to deny that Black lives matter. Necessary where a legal system from policing to prosecution and incarceration continues to disadvantage Black people when compared to whites. Necessary when Americans across the country feel it compelled to take to the streets and protest for equality, and necessary where state governors vow to enact harsher punishments for those protestors while completely failing to address the conditions which drove them to the streets.

Hank Willis Thomas (American, born 1976), 'Public Enemy (Black and Gold),' variation with ash, ...
COURTESY OF THE ARTIST AND JACK SHAINMAN GALLERY, NEW YORK. © HANK WILLIS THOMAS.

Hank Willis Thomas (American, born 1976), 'Public Enemy (Black and Gold),' 2017. Screenprint on ...
COURTESY OF THE ARTIST AND JACK SHAINMAN GALLERY, NEW YORK. © HANK WILLIS THOMAS.

But joy can also be found in Thomas' work if you know where to look.

“One of the artworks that says this to me, personally, most movingly is I Am. Amen, a 20-panel painting that moves us through historical and personal permutations of the phrase ‘I am a man,’” Stein said. “That proclamation, taken from signs held aloft by marchers in the 1968 Memphis Sanitation Workers strike, shouldn’t be necessary, but it was and is, the last panel of Thomas’s artwork changes the phrase to ‘I Am. Amen.,’ a profound—and joyful—affirmation of existence and individual consciousness in a world that sometimes wants to extinguish both.”

This exhibition has been realized in collaboration with a Community Committee. Composed of volunteer thinkers, activists and artists recruited locally, the Community Committee has illuminated the artwork anew with their voices and views, which visitors will encounter both in the gallery and in public engagement programs. This initiative responds to a common complaint aimed at art museums, where even when displaying the work of minority artists, that work is most often curated by a white curator, for a white museum director and ends up consciously or unconsciously programmed to white audiences.

“We approached the project this way because the artist’s work calls us to, and out of personal and professional conviction among the project team to push the field away from established, sometimes exclusionary methods,” Stein said.

In response to a summer of Covid-19 deaths and Black Lives Matter activism, the museum and committee are reimagining a collection of public programs exploring pressing questions raised by the exhibition while following evolving public health and safety guidelines. Details about digital, on-site and off-site programming will be posted to the museum’s website throughout the fall.

Hank Willis Thomas (American, born 1976), 'I Am. Amen.', 2009. Liquitex on canvas, 25 1/4 x 19 x 1/4 ...
IMAGE COURTESY OF THE ARTIST AND JACK SHAINMAN GALLERY, NEW YORK. © HANK WILLIS THOMAS.

“The pandemic and the Movement for Black Lives both focused acute attention on the question of what is considered essential in our society, who gets to define and speak loudest about that question, and in what forums,” Stein said. “We reoriented our thinking around what we could contribute to pressing needs regarding trauma and healing; political process and civic discourse; and envisioning the future. With our community partners, we devised programs that address each of these areas.”

What has the result been?

“I’ve seen visitors break out into applause, I’ve seen them feel angry, I’ve seen people feel heard and represented, I’ve seen them cry,” Stein said. “I see visitors telling their circles it is necessary to come to the exhibition; I see them truly engage—which is the most important thing.”

Hank Willis Thomas: All Things Being Equal... can be seen at the Cincinnati Art Museum through November 8.

Wake up call: artist Hank Willis Thomas wants to spur voter turnout with the Wide Awakes group

Based on the 1860 Wide Awake movement that mobilised against slavery and helped elect Lincoln, the new network of artists and creatives has launched Kickstarter's largest collaboration to date

WALLACE LUDEL and MARGARET CARRIGAN

16th September 2020 19:16 BST

Wide Awake members attend a Juneteenth celebration in Harlem.

A group known as the Wide Awakes, originally launched in January by Hank Willis Thomas, is now working to organise a large network of artists, cultural workers and activists in hopes of fighting injustice and getting out the vote in the lead up to the 2020 presidential election.

Comprised of artists like Thomas, Kehinde Wiley, Arthur Jafa and rafa esparza, along with organisations such as Creative Time, For Freedoms and the Guild of Future Architects, the Wide Awake network takes their name from an outspoken group of 19th-century abolitionists who helped elect Abraham Lincoln. Thomas, Wiley and esparza are all fi itself as “a network of like minds who create in the name of liberation, artist sovereignty, and the evolution of society” that aims “to radically reimagine the future and enable self-empowerment”, according to its mission statement.

Artist Wildcat Ebony Brown is part of the Wide Awakes, a group that is encouraging people to get out and vote. Benjamin Lozovsky

While most of their events so far have been spontaneous at marches and rallies that had already been planned, the Wide Awakes are now planning their first coordinated march on 3

Awakes, in which 10,000 protesters marched through New York City in advance of Lincoln's election. The event will be held in cities across the country as well as virtually.

Additionally, 14 members of the Wide Awakes have launched a Kickstarter that will fund 14 projects across the US, from town halls to dream up new inclusive policies to artistic interventions to combat voter suppression in the lead up to the 2020 presidential election. It marks the largest collaboration of cultural leaders Kickstarter has ever seen on its platform.

An illustration from an 1860 edition of Harper's Weekly depicting the original Grand Procession of Wide Awakes in New York.

Library of Congress Prints and Photographs Division

"I was a mixture of curious and eager to find out what new collective he had envisioned," says Patton Hindle, Kickstarter's Head of Arts, of her initial meeting with Thomas in January. "It was immediately clear that he had a powerful and historically rooted movement on his hands, fuelled with joy and inclusivity in a way that no other is, which is exactly what we need in this moment and our future."

An original Wide Awake flyer from 1860 inspired Amplifier's 2020 version.

The original Wide Awakes were led by young men—and some women, who did not yet have the right to vote—and cultivated by the Republican Party (Lincoln's political party) during the 1860 presidential election. Appearing at popular social events and distributing promotional comic books and art ephemera, the group appealed to a younger generation of voters beleaguered by the partisan infighting of the 1850s and offered northerners a much-needed political identity in the face of regressive southern policies.

As a wave of racial reckoning swept the US, the Wide Awakes held large rallies in northern cities such as New York, Chicago and Philadelphia, turning out in distinctive uniforms consisting of a black cape under standard banner depicting the image of a large eyeball. After Lincoln's inauguration, when political tensions escalated to civil war, many of the Wide Awake members were among the first wave to join the Union army.

The original Wide Awakes wore oilcloth capes, which have inspired the artist-designed capes emblazoned with eyes Thomas's Wide Awakes group has created.

Burton Historical Collection, Detroit
Public Library

The 21st-century reincarnation of the Wide Awakes comes complete with capes inspired by the original oilcloths and designed by artists Wildcat Ebony Brown, Anya Ayoung Chee, Kambui Olujimi and Coby Kennedy.

The group has been active since before the Black Lives Matter protests began in late May but, since then, members have popped up at a Juneteenth celebration in Harlem; Fourth of July protests in New York, Berlin and Chicago; a 19th amendment rally at Grand Army Plaza in Brooklyn, and at the March on Washington commemorating the Dr. Martin Luther King's march for civil rights. On Election Day, 3 November, the Wide Awakes will also hold a virtual poll party.

Wide Awakes updated cloak designs. Jeff Vespa

Funds raised from its Kickstarter will be divvied up between the 14 organisations, which include Kindred Arts, In Plain Sight, Amplifier and more. A full list can be found at the Kickstarter page ↗, where donations can also be made. Pledges made to the Wide Awakes come with varying rewards. At the smaller donation level, a $15 pledge yields a Wide Awakes pin while a t-shirt by Jenny Holzer is available for $45. For donations over $7,500, donors can receive an original rafa esparza sculpture, a work of art by Michele Pred or a silkscreen by Thomas, produced in an edition of five. Black capes with the Wide Awake eye are available for an $85 pledge.

More News

Topics

US politics

Wide Awakes

Hank Willis Thomas

Rafa Esparza

Michele Pred

Jenny Holzer

For Freedoms

Creative Time

Kickstarter

Black Lives Matter

Related content

Rediscovered Paul Gauguin manuscript written in his Polynesian hut reveals artist's hidden secrets

Van Gogh exhibitions return—exclusive news all the way up to 2024

Cranach, Courbet and Corot: a closer look at what the Brooklyn
Museum is selling off

Banksy loses trademark battle over his famous Flower
Thrower image

Activist employee group demands resignations of three Guggenheim leaders

Cancel art galleries?
Staff take grievances against employers to Instagram

The Art Angle Podcast: How Hank Willis Thomas Is Making Politics an Art Form

On this week's episode, artist and political activist Hank Willis Thomas explains how he strives to address society's injustices in his art.

Artnet News (<https://news.artnet.com/about/artnet-news-39>), July 10, 2020

Hank Willis Thomas is a busy man. The 44-year-old photographer, sculptor, filmmaker, and writer was already a force within the rarefied world of visual art before he decided to embrace politics on a large scale. But during the landmark presidential race of 2016, Thomas and fellow artist Eric Gottesman co-founded an “anti-partisan” political action committee (<https://news.artnet.com/market/artist-political-action-committee-441083>) called For Freedoms (<https://forfreedoms.org/>) to empower artists to channel their creative energy into civic engagement. Along with facilitating major public artworks such as murals and artist-designed billboards (<https://news.artnet.com/art-world/fall-artist-made-billboards-will-installed-50-states-1296806>), For Freedoms has since grown into a larger nonprofit organization that has held townhall meetings, organized voter-registration drives, and even assembled its own multi-day national Congress (<https://news.artnet.com/opinion/for-freedoms-congress-1767150>) in Los Angeles. Not bad for a side hustle.

The son of renowned art historian and photographer Deborah Willis, Thomas first rose to prominence for his early photography, which used the visual language of advertising to address systemic injustices such as the exploitation of professional athletes, the scourge of mass incarceration, and the original sin of American slavery. Years before the latest wave of activists (<https://news.artnet.com/the-art-angle/art-angle-podcast-christopher-columbus-monument-1889696>) began toppling statues (<https://news.artnet.com/art-world/colonial-monuments-topple-europe-1880991>) of Christopher Columbus (<https://news.artnet.com/art-world/monuments-across-the-united-states-re-emerged-as-targets-of-fury-over-a-weekend-of-widespread-protest-1876542>), Robert E. Lee, and other problematic figures in US history, Thomas also began questioning the validity of such monuments with his own large-scale sculptures, often creating alternatives to honor the individuals whose sacrifices have been overlooked by mainstream historical narratives.

Thomas once said that his personal experiences prompted him to create art that could “change the world in a more intentional way,” and now more than ever, he is doing just that. Through July 16, he and his Los Angeles gallery, Kayne Griffin Corcoran, are teaming with Artnet Auctions to present “Bid for (<https://www.artnet.com/auctions/bid-for-peace-0720/>)Peace (<https://www.artnet.com/auctions/bid-for-peace-0720/>),” a single-lot sale of Thomas’s striking sculpture Peace (2019). All proceeds from the auction including the buyer’s premium will be donated to G.L.I.T.S (<https://www.glitsinc.org/>), Gay and Lesbians Living in a Transgender Society, a non-profit organization that protects the rights of transgender sex workers.

A few days before the opening of “Bid for Peace,” Thomas joined Andrew Goldstein on the Art Angle to discuss the evolution of his studio practice, artists’ importance to bringing about civic transformation, and whether you might someday see his own name on a ballot near you.

The New York Times

Protesting U.S. Immigration Policies, Artists Aim for the Sky

This Independence Day, 70 artists are having messages of solidarity and defiance typed in the sky to highlight the plight of immigrants held in detention centers.

By Zachary Small

July 3, 2020

The Thunderbirds and Blue Angels that President Trump plans to send flying over the National Mall this Fourth of July will have some stiff competition from a group of 70 artists looking to spread their own messages across the nation's skies.

Two fleets of five skytyping planes each are set for takeoff across the country this Independence Day weekend armed with calls for the abolition of the immigrant detention in the United States as part of the project “In Plain Sight.” (Developed from older skywriting technology, skytyping planes inject oil into their exhaust systems to produce a white smoke that is released into the sky by a computer-controlled system to produce precise letter-writing.) Phrases like “Care Not Cages,” “Unseen Mothers” and “Nosotras Te Vemos (We See You)” will momentarily hover above 80 locations — including detention facilities, immigration courts, prisons, borders and historic sites like Ellis Island — before dissipating into the atmosphere. And some of the messages will be skytyped in nearly 20 languages, including Hindi, Kurdish, Lakota and Punjabi.

The project started a year ago when the artists Cassils and rafa esparza teamed up with a goal of forming a coalition of artists and activists determined to address the ills of mass detention. The initiative's members include the lawyer Chase Strangio; a founder of Black Lives Matter, Pattrisse Cullors; and the artist Hank Willis Thomas — alongside 10 partner organizations including the American Civil Liberties Union of Southern California, Raices and the Immigrant Legal Resource Center.

An AR still of “Soy Paz Soy Más,” one of the phrases that will momentarily hover above locations like detention facilities, immigration courts, prisons and borders before they dissipate. Maria Gaspar

In Plain Sight, 2020 A coalition of 20 artists coming together to fight migrant detention and the culture of incarceration.

An AR still of “Nosotras Te Vemos.” The skytyping will appear in 19 languages. Zackary Drucker

“As a lawyer, I am often constrained by the structural and discursive limits of the law,” said Strangio, who’s using his corner of the sky to memorialize Lorena Borjas, a transgender immigrant activist who died of Covid-19 in March. “I believe that art and artistic disruption are essential components of movements for social transformation.”

For the artist Alok Vaid-Menon — whose message “God Brown America” will be skytyped above the Montgomery Processing Center close to Vaid-Menon’s hometown, College Park, Texas — the project represents a commitment to elevating the stories of migrants and gender-nonconforming people. “As a descendant of refugees, it’s really important for me to help with this cause,” Vaid-Menon said. “I want to make sure people of color and immigrants in Texas feel like they belong.”

But the challenge of putting art into the sky has also required the legwork of a medium-sized production team led by Cristy Michel, who is also Cassils’ life partner. They found one company that does skytyping, she said, referring to Skytypers, which does the vast majority of the business in the United States. “And this is not something the pilots have done before,” she said. “Usually what they write looks like ‘Geico, Geico, Geico.’”

“When I sense the skytypers getting nervous,” Michel added, “we get into a discussion about how art helps the mind expand and think about future possibilities.”

Speaking by phone last week, Cassils and esparza described the artistic impulses behind “In Plain Sight.”

These are edited excerpts from that conversation.

In recent years, artists have spread their political messages on billboards, filled museums with agitprop and even started their own activist groups. How did you decide to bring your project into the clouds?

CASSILS About a year ago, rafa started a conversation with a bunch of artists in Los Angeles about issues surrounding migrant detention. We were trying to counter feelings of hopelessness and wondered what we, as artists, could do to visualize the issue on a massive scale. I’m a performance artist who is often given a pretty modest budget; there are often limitations to what’s possible. But what if artists like us could plan something bigger? What if artists had the same budget as a shoe company does for its brand promotions, but rather than selling objects, we would be promoting a constructive dialogue? Then, we thought about the air shows that typically happen on Independence Day. Was it possible to usurp this traditional display of patriotism and retool it to bring attention to harmful migration policies? There's no censorship in the sky. It would be a perfect platform for mass engagement.

ESPARZA There were simple questions: How do you let incarcerated people know that you care? From there, our approach broadened by working with a cohort of artists and an advocacy impact team. We also have a film director working on a documentary about the project.

An AR still of "Modeerf," above a corrections center in Baldwin County, Ala. Sonya Clark

How has the project changed since the coronavirus pandemic? Has the outbreak forced you to alter your approach?

CASSILS The urgency of "In Plain Sight" has become paramount as people began to die from Covid-19 in detention camps. We had initially planned for this project to occur without any press, but when the pandemic hit, we launched our Instagram page that features short interviews with our artists and calls to action. It's been a great opportunity to take action. In recent months, I've had 11 exhibitions canceled or paused. Almost every artist I know has, too.

There is a rich history of artists looking toward the sky for inspiration. Yves Klein used it as inspiration for his conceptual blue paintings. Recently, the artist Jammie Holmes flew George Floyd's final words above five cities across the country. What other works have inspired your skytyping project?

ESPARZA "Repellent Fence" (2015) by the art collective Postcommodity was particularly important for us. They created a metaphorical suture along the migration path between the United States and Mexico with tethered balloons to speak about land art in relation to permanence and shifting landscapes. In the same way that they used the land to talk about the divisive power of colonial structures, we are hoping to index the sky as a symbol of inspiration and hope. And the sky is able to migrate messages across borders. When our message is skytyped above San Diego, the words will likely drift into Tijuana. And when our words are written above Los Angeles, they will have a shared orbital path, allowing phrases like "Abolition Now" and "Stop Crimigration Now" to coalesce into a circular message.

CASSILS We are also thinking of artists who have used the language of advertisement to get their points across. Artists like Lynda Benglis and Barbara Hammer. The AIDS Memorial Quilt was another important reference because it demonstrates how people can come together through a patchwork of activism.

Many artists involved with the project are also queer, which may or may not be a coincidence. We are thinking about the words of José Esteban Muñoz, who wrote in 2009 that “queerness exists for us as an ideality that can be distilled from the past and used to imagine a future.” We see a liberation for queer, migrant and Black communities as deeply bound together because they are all rooted in the issues of white supremacy and colonization. Our jobs as queer artists is to imagine the future.

ESPARZA And we are putting the proposal of care, which is central to many queer communities, at the forefront of this project. We want to imagine what care looks like for people who are impacted by migrant detention and Covid-19.

CASSILS Bringing the skytypers into the fold has also been a unique experience. And with some messages being written in Cree, Farsi and Urdu, this will likely be the first time many people will see their own languages in the sky. There has also been a challenge to imagine how to write languages in the sky that don’t use the Roman alphabet. Skytypers usually work in fleets of five planes each, so any image or letter must exist along a five-point matrix. For artists on the project, that means experimenting with the grid and drawing out words like “freedom” in Farsi or Urdu. It’s interesting to note the challenges of what we can put into the sky, and how we might overcome those barriers.

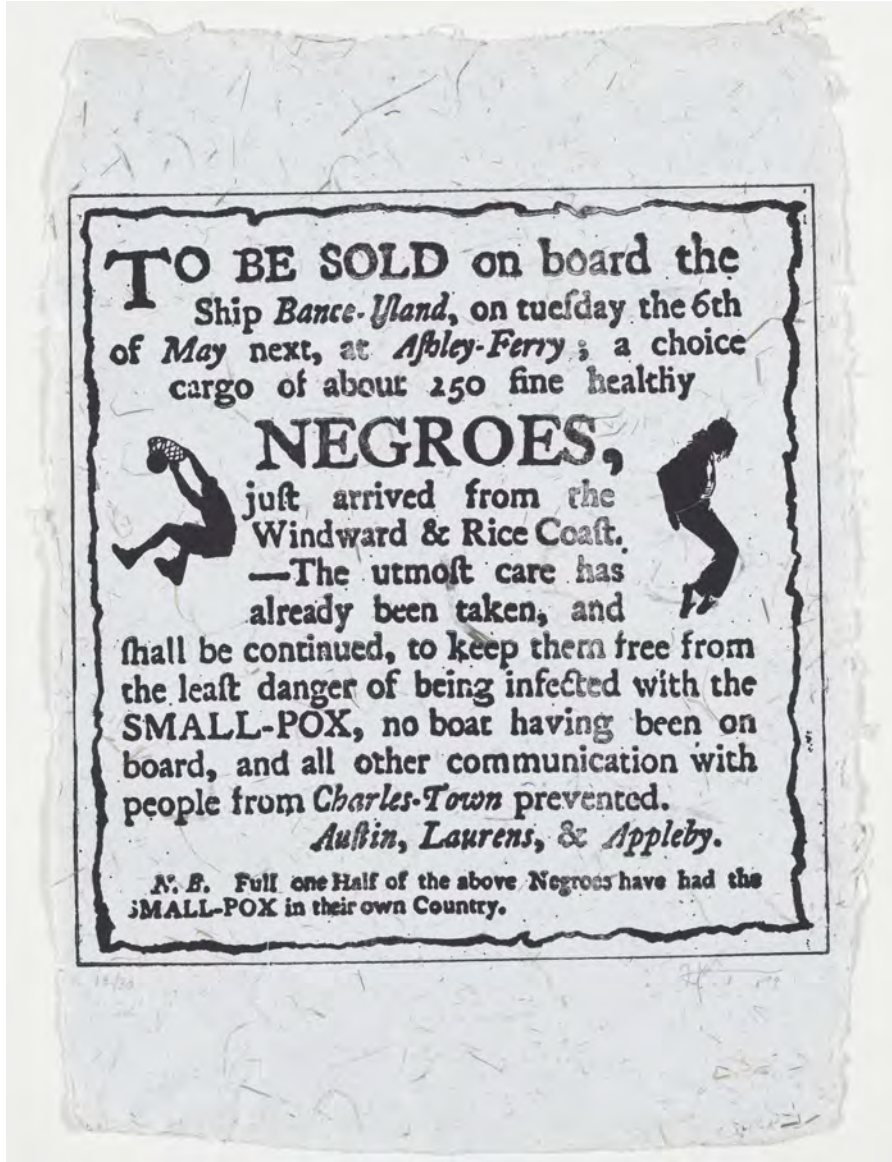

In Plain Sight

Find out how to see the art at: instagram.com/inplainsightmap/

Harvard / Art Museum

Reflecting on Freedom

June 30, 2020

2018.33.60

Hank Willis Thomas, American, To Be Sold, 2009. Laser-cut relief print on handmade paper. Harvard Art Museums/Fogg Museum, Margaret Fisher Fund, 2018.33.60. © Hank Willis Thomas. Courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York.

to enslaved African Americans that they were free. And yet the promises of Emancipation, and of the constitutional amendments that followed, have not been fully realized. While Black Americans have made extraordinary achievements over the intervening century and a half, racial discrimination, terror, and violence continue to be leveled against them.

Seeking to foster continued discussion around this longstanding and ongoing injustice—in the wake of the murders of George Floyd, Breonna Taylor, Ahmaud Arbery, Tony McDade, Dion Johnson, Rayshard Brooks, and so many others—this final installment in our three-part series considers a selection of works by modern and contemporary Black artists who, over the last few decades, have addressed the history of systemic racism and the inextricable relationship of past and present. In print and in paint, these artists reflect on the Black American experience by synthesizing historical narratives, popular culture, and personal stories.

Legacies

With the print pictured above, made during a residency at the Brandywine Workshop in Philadelphia in 2009, conceptual artist Hank Willis Thomas re-creates a 1760 advertisement for a South Carolina sale of 250 enslaved African men, women, and children. Thomas reproduces the ad's text verbatim but replaces its schematic renderings of African figures with the silhouettes of two modern celebrities: Shaquille O'Neal and Michael Jackson. This provocative juxtaposition of past and present, enslavement and success, raises questions about the legacy of slavery and the continued commodification of Black bodies. In connection with works like this one, Thomas has remarked on the spectacle of the enslaved, abused, and lynched in relation to that of the athletes and performers on trademarked while still in college. The work stands both as an acknowledgment of Black achievement and as an indictment of a society that still fails to value all Black lives.

To hear Hank Willis Thomas speak on the intersection of art, race, and justice, watch a conversation with him at Radcliffe's Vision & Justice program in April 2019.

*Joanna Sheers Seidenstein, Stanley H. Durwood Foundation
Curatorial Fellow, Division of European and American Art*

ARTFORUM

DIARY

WASHINGTON POSTCARD

June 19, 2020 • Washington, DC • Kriston Capps on art and protest in the capital

Hank Willis Thomas and Baz Dreisinger's The Writing on the Wall projected onto the US Department of Justice building. All photos: Liz Gorman.

A VIDEO PROJECTION on the facade of the US Department of Justice building played to an audience of one for its debut last week in Washington, DC.

Moments after the light beam touched the limestone, an agent from the US Department of Homeland Security arrived, demanding to know who the projectionists were with. They weren't "with" anybody, one of the four of them said. The agent made a call on a radio. He put his face in their faces. He shouted. Military jeeps swept down Pennsylvania Avenue, but they glided past the tense nighttime scene.

The standoff lasted only minutes. The projection squad relented, wheeling their cart away from the DOJ. They were followed by an SUV marked "Federal Protective Services: FPS," one of the countless abbreviations still patrolling the District of Columbia as part of a federal occupation of the city that has stretched on for two weeks.

Eventually, the projection team landed, blocks from the Capitol, at what was once the Newseum, where a fifty-ton marble slab bearing an inscription of the First Amendment hangs over the now-empty building. In a desultory gesture, the crew projected the visual installation, which illuminates the grotesque excesses of the justice system, over the seven-story text of the First Amendment, this time to an audience of no one in particular—not even an agent on the hunt for Antifa.

The Writing on the Wall, a collaboration between Hank Willis Thomas and Baz Dreisinger, capped off the second week of conflict in the nation's capital in the wake of George Floyd's death at the hands of Minneapolis police. The projection comprises letters, poems, drawings, and other ephemera produced by incarcerated people, a testament on behalf of the 2.3 million Americans who currently reside in prisons, jails, and other correctional facilities. The text crawls as if it's pinging off a typewriter, revealing sing-song verse about solitude and confinement, even an ode to Harriet Tubman. Sometimes the words appear as legible poetry, but more often in overlapping patterns. There is far too much text to read, but enough to register a mass refrain of suffering.

Signs on the fence surrounding the White House.

“We’ve been talking about 2020 being a year of Great Awakening,” Thomas said. “It’s not a coincidence that this global movement comes out of a period of great pause and self-reflection by humans all over the world about what’s valuable—literally the preciousness of each breath.”

The Writing on the Wall drew crowds last year as a physical installation of art and letters on the High Line, New York’s notorious public promenade, where the piece had it both ways as an offering to and commentary on the crowds taking a stroll; the piece has been adapted as a projection for touring in a pandemic landscape in which viewerships most likely belong to Instagram. Its context is doubly changed by the worldwide uprising over police brutality. On Juneteenth, the piece travels to Columbus, Ohio, where it will be projected at three locations around the city just after dark, a display to underscore the direct historical passage from slavery to mass incarceration.

“America exported this system of mass incarceration onto the world in this cut-and-paste fashion,” said Dreisinger, a City University of New York professor who serves as the executive director of the Incarceration Nations Network. “It’s our duty to deal with this in a global context.”

In the District, The Writing on the Wall punctuated a weekslong back-and-forth between citizens and state over the boundaries of speech. The game of one-upmanship started on June 1, when federal law enforcement agents used tear gas to clear out Lafayette Square so that President Donald Trump could walk the breezy block to St. John’s Church unfettered in order to hold up the Bible, the Word of God, as his standard. Then the White House dug in, erecting a nearly two-mile-long fence around Lafayette Square to wall off federal grounds. District Mayor Muriel Bowser clapped back on June 6 by emblazoning “BLACK LIVES MATTER” on the stretch of 16th Street leading up to 1600 Pennsylvania Ave—a mural maneuver that has been replicated by cities all over the nation. Protesters amended the mayor’s stunt the next morning, painting “DEFUND THE POLICE” as an extension of BLM Plaza and a rebuke to the mayor.

Black Lives Matter Plaza.

At every step so far, the lines in this public confrontation have been demarcated by text art. Much of the fence around the public parks of Lafayette Square and the Ellipse has since come down, but not before demonstrators covered its surface with art, signs, ribbon, balloons, and other forms of graphic testimony to spell out the wages of police brutality. The poetry along the perimeter wall surrounding the White House came to resemble the artifacts that make up The Writing on the Wall: psalms of despair, notes of triumph, portraits, and inscriptions of too many names to count.

Once, most viewers may have responded to a piece such as The Writing on the Wall with passive introspection or distracted compassion. All that has changed with the mass protests over police brutality, which have ignited a public fire to abolish every part of the criminal justice system. Matthew Wilson, an artist and curator whose work with the project started while serving time at the Otisville Correctional Facility in New York, hopes that people who walk away from the piece can put themselves in the shoes of the individuals who contributed to the exhibit; that seems much more likely in an environment in which the viewers are breaking down the walls as fast as they come up.

With the federal occupation of the District winding down, shop owners are painting over graffiti on boarded-up storefronts, leaving little abstract blotches of color all over the city. Unidentified out-of-state soldiers have returned to their bases, taking their Humvees with them in long caravans streaming out of the city after dark. The Writing on the Wall, while seen by no one, was felt by many. The hope behind the piece, and the protests, is that the testimony won't disappear when the text does. "The abolition movement isn't over," Thomas told me. "This is part of that continuum."

—Kriston Capps

By CAROLINA A. MIRANDA
STAFF WRITER

MARCH 5, 2020
8 AM

Here are nine exhibitions and events around Southern California to check out in the coming week:

Last Chance

Hank Willis Thomas, “An All Colored Cast,” at Kayne Griffin Corcoran. In his first solo show in Los Angeles, Thomas explores the nature of color while also exploring the nature of representation in Hollywood. The pièce de résistance is a sculpture inspired by the General Lee, the car that appeared in television’s “The Dukes of Hazzard,” the Dodge Charger painted with a Confederate flag that was at the center of the action — an object of television nostalgia that also evokes histories of violence against African Americans. Through Saturday. 1201 S. La Brea Ave., Mid-Wilshire, Los Angeles, kaynegriffincorcoran.com.

Galerie

Spring 2020

BACKSTORY

Freedom of Expression

CONCEPTUAL ARTIST
HANK WILLIS THOMAS AND GALLERIST
JACK SHAINMAN
DISCUSS 15 EXCITING YEARS OF COLLABORATION

Artist Hank Willis Thomas (left) and gallerist Jack Shainman in front of Thomas's work Frosted Yellow Willows (or Anna May Wong) Hidden Colors (2019).

Hank Willis Thomas is in demand more than ever, with his traveling museum survey now on view at Crystal Bridges Museum of American Art in Bentonville, Arkansas, and public art commissions in the works for the Brooklyn Academy of Music and Boston Commons. But 15 years ago, gallerist Jack Shainman took a chance on the then young, unknown photographer and has nurtured his career ever since.

How They Met

Jack Shainman: It was through Claude Simard, my partner in the gallery who passed away—he found Hank in 2004 through an art handler who had gone to school with him.

Hank Willis Thomas: I was living in San Francisco. I knew zero about commercial art galleries because I was a “photographer” and there were so few focused on photography. Claude just called me up, with his very thick

BACKSTORY

Clockwise from left: Guernica (2016) was part of Thomas's recent exhibition "All Things Being Equal . . ." at the Portland Art Museum. Thomas's Unity is a permanent installation in Brooklyn. Branded Head (2003).

French-Canadian accent, and said, "I like your work. Can you send me some so I can see it in person?" Shainman: The day the photograph Branded Head arrived, Claude was ready to give him the whole gallery. We immediately hung it in the office. We were really interested in the subject matter that Hank was working with—advertising and branding, oppression, race—and the fact that it looked like nothing I had ever seen before.

Thomas: When I made that image, I was a grad student. I was like, "What, you want to sell it?"

Do you remember how much that picture cost? It was $600. I was like, "Wow, $600!"

Their First Show

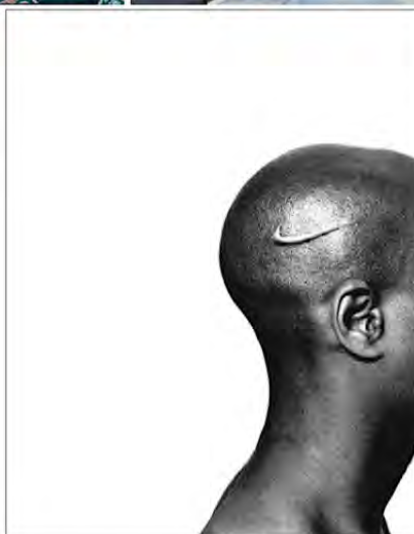

Thomas: We'd been working with each other for a couple of years, but I hadn't had a show yet. I happened to be visiting the gallery from San Francisco in 2006, and another artist had just fallen through.

Shainman: So we just offered him that show, "Hank Willis Thomas: B*ANDED," while he was standing at the front desk. As it opened, we were still waiting for the work to arrive. We had put in an order with the printer months earlier, and the work got delivered kind of late. I always say to people, the first show—it's just the beginning.

Life Change

Thomas: Around 2008, Jack called me. I was living in San Francisco peacefully, enjoying my life. Jack said, "Hank, it's time that you move to New York. It's nice to see you every few months, but I think it will really make a difference." I moved back to New York because of Jack. And he was right.

Shainman: I like to encourage artists to push themselves.

A Unique Collaboration

Thomas: In the last presidential election season, I was telling Jack that my friend Eric Gottesman and I were thinking about starting a super PAC. Jack said, "You have to do this. You can have the gallery." We turned the 24th Street space into our headquarters for the summer of 2016. We started doing advertisements, billboards, town hall talks in the gallery, an exhibition and titled it "For Freedoms." We had top artists like Carrie Mae Weems. We put Nina Chanel Abney, who was then still an emerging talent, in the show. Jack gave us carte blanche.

Shainman: Hank helped me cross one thing off my bucket list. I had always kind of been jealous of Chris Ofili and Andres Serrano; that getting denounced by the right wing catapulted them to the top of the art world. I saw pictures of Dread Scott's piece A Man Was Lynched by Police Yesterday and said, "Bring that over." We put that flag out in front of "For Freedoms." The next day Fox News called for an interview, which I naively actually did, and we started getting death threats. It was horrible. But I was able to cross a second bucket list thing off: The New York Times had a story about the show and Dread Scott's flag.

How They See Each Other

Shainman: Hank is super generous. A lot of artists are not interested in other artists' work. Hank loves to support artists and give them a chance. Over the years he's shown me so many people—one of them was Toyin Ojih Odutola.

Thomas: Something that I've always loved about Jack is that when I want to do something crazy that I've never done before, he's like, "Okay." hankwillisthomas.com, jackshainman.com —HILARIE M. SHEETS

The Year Ahead in African American Art: What to See and Do in 2020

by VICTORIA L. VALENTINE on Feb 26, 2020 • 10:58 am

THE YEAR IN BLACK ART is off to a fascinating start. In January, Helen Molesworth organized a Noah Davis (1983-2015) exhibition at David Zwirner gallery in New York, a rare look at more than 20 paintings by the late Los Angeles-based artist and founder of the Underground Museum. The Johnson Publishing Company art collection was sold at Swann Auction Galleries, introducing more than 24 new African American artists to the auction market and setting records for an additional 27 artists, according to Swann.

There is much more to come as the year unfolds. Recognizing the 100th anniversary of the 19th amendment giving women the right to vote, a number of institutions are planning exhibitions and events reflecting the historic milestone, none more ambitious than the Baltimore Museum of Art where all of its 2020 programming is focused on women artists, including Mickalene Thomas, Valerie Maynard, SHAN Wallace, and Shinique Smith.

Across the United States, major photography exhibitions are opening featuring Dawoud Bey, Deana Lawson, and Louis Draper and the Kamoinge Workshop. South African photographer Zanele Muholi's first major UK survey opens at the Tate Modern in April. Solo shows at major institutions are celebrating artists such as Jordan Casteel, Tschabalala Self, Lynette Yiadom-Boakye, Christina Quarles, and Deborah Roberts, who focus on portraiture and black figures. Huge events are also happening in Bentonville, Ark., with the debut of a new arts space, and New Orleans, where Prospect.5 opens in October.

Following is a selection of more than two dozen important exhibitions, events, and happenings to look forward to in 2020:

HANK WILLIS THOMAS, "Icarus," 2016 (quilt, 56 1/2 x 85 1/4 X 2 inches). | © Hank Willis Thomas. Courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York

EXHIBITION | "Riffs and Relations: African American Artists and the European Modernist Tradition" @ Phillips Collection, Washington, D.C. | Feb. 29-May 24, 2020

Exploring the complicated influences of European modernists on African American artists active in the 20th and 21st centuries, this show brings together works by more than 50 artists including William H. Johnson, Pablo Picasso, Romare Bearden, Bob Thompson, Felrath Hines, Henri Matisse, Sam Middleton, Carrie Mae Weems, Ellen Gallagher, Winold Reiss, Vincent van Gogh, Mickalene Thomas, John Edmonds, and Hank Willis Thomas. Curated by Adrienne Childs, the exhibition is accompanied by a fully illustrated catalog.

ART, EVENTS, YORKVILLE

Gracie Mansion's largest art exhibition explores social justice and inclusion

POSTED ON TUE, FEBRUARY 25, 2020 BY DEVIN GANNON

All photos by Michael Appleton/NYC Mayor's Office

A new art exhibition is open at Gracie Mansion, the fourth and final installation of Mayor Bill de Blasio and First Lady Chirlane McCray's tenure. Catalyst: Art and Social Justice, which will also be the largest ever hosted at the historic home in Yorkville, features more than 75 works created by over 50 artists since the 1960s. With a focus on inclusion, the exhibit explores the connection between art, justice, and the social change movements behind it all.

"Catalyst highlights the triumphs and difficulties, internal and external, of people as individuals and members of movements and communities as they wrestle with climate change, racism, misogyny, ableism, homophobia, and more," McCray said in a press release. "Catalyst puts us in the middle of urgent national public conversations. This exhibition is certain to upend perceptions, expand awareness, and fire the imagination."

Seven themes are on display at the exhibit: Affirming Self; Concepts of Justice; E Pluribus Unum/Out of Many, One; The Habitable Earth; Health, Wellness and Universal Access; A Livable City; and Pursuit of Equality. Artworks, mainly by living artists, reflect initiatives spearheaded by the administration, including Pre-K for all, the Unity Project to aid LGBTQ youth, and the She Built NYC project.

Highlights include Jeffery Gibson's I am A Rainbow Too, Tattfoo Tan's S.O.S. Free Seeds Library, Teresita Fernández's Small American Fires, Gordon Parks' March on Washington, and Martine Fougerson's South Bronx Trades.

The installation was curated by Jessica Bell Brown, who serves as the associate curator of contemporary at the Baltimore Museum of Art. Brown also organized Gracie Mansion's last exhibition, She Persists: A Century of Women Artists in New York 1919-2019.

"First Lady McCray has breathed new life into Gracie Mansion over the course of her tenure," Brown said. "Never before have the extraordinary works of such diverse and inter-generational groups of artists of our time been front and center at Gracie. Artists time and again are witnesses to the truths of life, liberty and justice. They hold us accountable to each other as neighbors, as citizens, and as members of a wider collective."

TIME

INEQUALITY

Behind the Making of TIME's Martin Luther King Jr. Cover

Thea Traff for TIME

BY ANNA PURNA KAMBHAMPATY

FEBRUARY 20, 2020

After TIME created a virtual-reality version of the 1963 March on Washington, we asked artist Hank Willis Thomas how he would translate that immersive experience onto a magazine cover.

In answer, at a Jan. 19 photo shoot in Los Angeles, Thomas—a co-founder of For Freedoms, a platform for artistic civic engagement—photographed actor Ty Brittingham, who served as a stand-in for King. A team of digital-human experts at visual-effects studio Digital Domain used those images as a foundation for posing and lighting the 3-D digital re-creation of King from The March—the work of a diverse team of VFX artists who were tasked with recreating the civil rights leader exactly as he looked on the day of Aug. 28, 1963. The two-dimensional rendering of that virtual reality figure became the March 2, 2020, cover.

The session itself was a learning process, says Thomas. “When we got approached to do this kind of groundbreaking portrait of one of our heroes, Martin Luther King Jr., who has been inspiring us for decades, I was super excited,” he says. “There were a lot of unknowns about the technology, about how you can do digital face mapping to produce images. It was a really amazing kind of learning experience for everyone involved.”

“The shoot wonderfully captured Hank’s collaborative approach to making art,” TIME’s director of photography Katherine Pomerantz said.

Thomas says he understood the need to convey both King's standing as a historical figure and his legacy. The idea of bringing past movements into the present is one with which Thomas is familiar: One of his reimaginings of Norman Rockwell's "Four Freedoms" paintings was featured on the Nov. 26, 2018, cover of TIME, and his latest project creates a similar sense of time warp.

From Feb. 28 to March 1, the For Freedoms team will be gathering artists, activists and other creators for a series of events in Los Angeles to emphasize the relationship between creative collaboration and civic action. Thomas hopes those events are just the beginning of a larger movement inspired by the "Wide Awakes" chapters that rallied behind Abraham Lincoln in the 1860 election, and that used public demonstrations and other tactics to encourage young Americans to be politically engaged.

"Our team has always been about collective projects and really aiming to bring people together and unite their culture and art," says Christina Caputo, a For Freedoms adviser, "instead of kind of focusing on projects that divide them."

This article is part of a special project about equality in America today. Read more about The March, TIME's virtual reality re-creation of the 1963 March on Washington and sign up for TIME's history newsletter for updates.

Want a print of TIME's Martin Luther King Jr. cover? Find it here.

CULTURED

PARTIES

CELEBRATING HANK WILLIS THOMAS AT KAYNE GRIFFIN CORCORAN

CULTURED MAGAZINE

02.19.2020

HANK WILLIS THOMAS. PHOTO BY OWEN KOLASINKI.

On February 14th, Artadia, LALA and Cultured celebrated Artadia Awardee Hank Willis Thomas with a garden brunch hosted by Capital Group and private walk through of his solo exhibition “An All Colored Cast” at Kayne Griffin Corcoran. A crowd gathered at the mid-city gallery to share breakfast before hearing the artist discuss his latest body of work. The show’s pièce de résistance was a recreation of the famed Confederate Flag-adorned car from Dukes of Hazard, which was installed nose-down on the gallery’s lawn. Among those in attendance were Allison Berg, Ron Finley, Cultured Editor-in-Chief Sarah Harrelson, Kyle DeWoody, Laura Hyatt, Jamie Manné, Iris Marden, Shula Nazarian, Tracy O’Brien, Tina Perry & Ric Whitney, Azadeh Shladovsky, Lesley Silverman and Autumn Williams.

NEWS

Monday, March 09, 2020

For Freedoms Community Conversation: Freedom of Speech

Feb. 17, 2020

In honor of their newest temporary exhibition, Hank Willis Thomas: All Things Being Equal... and the ongoing efforts of For Freedoms, Crystal Bridges Museum of American Art will present a series of four community conversations to deepen our understanding of issues affecting Northwest Arkansas communities.

The first will be about the freedom of speech from 1-3 p.m. Saturday, Feb. 29, in the Great Hall of Crystal Bridges in Bentonville.

Photo Submitted

For Freedoms Community Conversation: Freedom of Speech

Crystal Bridges invites you to participate in these conversations with a diverse group of local speakers including artists, city officials, and community leaders in the sharing of personal stories and work in relation to the topic. Each event will focus on one of the four freedoms, asking universal questions to spark conversation such as: "What does truth mean to you? What does an adequate standard of living mean to you? What does safety mean to you? What does love mean to you?"

The stories shared in this program are meant to bring different voices from the community together in a shared non-partisan space. All are welcome to participate and we ask you to come with a spirit of reciprocity.

In this community conversation, freedom of speech will be viewed through the frame of "What does it mean to speak your truth?" Speakers and audience members will be asked to recall a time when you first understood what speaking your truth meant, and to reflect on how that experience helped frame the way you saw/see the world. Universal questions may include: How does art challenge or demonstrate truth? What impact does freedom of speech have on someone else's truth?

This conversation will be led by the following speakers:

- Rev. Sekou, Memphis-based musician of the Freedom Fighters band and artist from For Freedoms Collective
- Srividya Venkatasubramanya, president of Ra-Ve Cultural Foundation, a local Indian performing arts organization
- Stephanie Orman, mayor of Bentonville
- Rebecca Ellis, Bentonville High School student who participated in the gun violence walkouts.

This event is free with online registration, and registered attendees will receive a free admission ticket to Hank Willis Thomas: All Things Being Equal... at the event. The programs will be moderated by fellows from the University of Arkansas IDEALS Institute.

Please note that a Crystal Bridges member will be taking photos and videos at this event. This footage may be used for internal purposes, such as promoting the next event or archiving. If you would prefer not to be photographed or recorded, you may opt out at the event.

CONTACTS

Rickey Lee Booker Jr., associate trainer
IDEALS Institute
479-575-4223, rbooker@uark.edu

John Post, director of academic communications
University Relations
479-575-5555, johnpost@uark.edu

In LA for Frieze Week? Here Is Our Guide to 33 Inspiring Gallery Shows to See Beyond the Fairs

See what LA galleries from Gagosian to Honor Fraser are showing across the city.

Sarah Cascone, February 10, 2020

Hank Willis Thomas, "People just like to look at me" (Spectrum IX), 2019 (variation without flash). Courtesy of Kayne Griffin Corcoran.

“Hank Willis Thomas: An All Colored Cast” at Kayne Griffin Corcoran Through March 7

Continuing to probe issues of race, gender, and identity, Hank Willis Thomas looks to Hollywood history for his first show with Kayne Griffin Corcoran, featuring sculptures and retroreflective prints activated by flash photography and based on found images from film archives. The exhibition is inspired by screen-color calibration charts, which were designed to make white people look good on camera; the works ask the viewer to reconsider loaded language like “color correction” and “white balance.”

Kayne Griffin Corcoran is located at 1201 South La Brea Avenue, Los Angeles, California.

ART | 4 DAYS AGO | BY HARRIET LLOYD-SMITH

Gun violence memorial created by Hank Willis Thomas and Mass Design Group in Washington

In Washington, DC, a poignant installation honours victims of gun violence in America

According to the nonprofit research group, Gun Violence Archive, almost 40,000 Americans are killed by gun violence each year, a tragedy exacerbated by recent economic issues related to Covid-19. Staged within the National Building Museum in Washington, DC, The Gun Violence Memorial Project was conceived by American conceptual artist Hank Willis Thomas and Mass Design Group in partnership with gun violence prevention organisations Purpose Over Pain and Everytown for Gun Safety Support Fund.

Free to the public, the poignant installation comprises four white houses, each constructed with 700 transparent glass bricks, a tribute to each person killed by guns each week in the US. The houses are already home to hundreds of personal artefacts, including photographs, baby shoes, graduation tassels and jewellery.

Over time, cavities will be filled with deeply personal objects of remembrance donated by the families of victims. Using the design as a prototype, the ambition for the project is a permanent national memorial that pays tribute the lives of those killed by guns.

‘My family felt the effects of gun violence first hand when my cousin was murdered during a robbery in 2000,’ says Thomas, who is also artistic director of Songha & Company, a conceptual public art practice named after the artist’s cousin, Songha Thomas Willis. ‘My life, and by extension my artistic practice, has been influenced ever since.’

The exhibition will also display excerpts from Comes the Light, a forthcoming documentary film exploring the effects of gun violence created by Haroula Rose and Caryn Capotosto.

The Gun Violence Memorial Project will be on view physically and online until September 2022 and is presented in conjunction with 'Justice is Beauty: The Work of Mass Design Group', a timely new show surveying the work of the socially conscious nonprofit architecture firm.

'As the recent tragic shootings in Colorado and Georgia sadly underscore, gun violence isn't an abstract concept, but an epidemic that strikes every American community,' said Brent D Glass, interim executive director of the National Building Museum. ✱

READ — CULTURE

INTERVIEW: ARTIST HANK WILLIS THOMAS

THE PROLIFIC ARTIST ON HIS RETROSPECTIVE, "ALL THINGS BEING EQUAL," AS IT MAKES ITS FINAL STOP IN CINCINNATI

Karen Day 3 September 2020

Black lives matter. While this chant began in 2013 as a response to the murder of teenager Trayvon Martin, it's a sentiment steeped in the USA's history and one that artist Hank Willis Thomas has been exploring for two decades. His work takes a careful look at the messages we intercept every day—from advertising to sports to art and beyond—and reconfigures it to expose some essential truths about ourselves, what we allow to influence us and who we are as a collective humanity.

Thomas may be someone who flies under the radar due to his quiet, humble nature, but his oeuvre speaks volumes about the way he views the world. And it's not just limited to his personal output, which is collaborative in its realization but inspired by his own curiosities; Thomas is also the co-founder of For Freedoms, an organization for creative civic engagement, and the Wide Awakes, a super-current platform for community- and creativity-driven understanding of mobilization and participation.

Hank Willis Thomas "Public Enemy (II)" [variation without flash] (2017) Courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York.
© Hank Willis Thomas

It makes sense, then, that Thomas was due for a mid-career retrospective. The homage to one of our greatest living artists began in Portland at the end of last year, where his work was curated by Julie Dolan and Sara Krajewski for the exhibition All Things Being Equal. After stopping in Bentonville, Arkansas, the show is now on its last leg in Ohio, at the Cincinnati Art Museum, where they've added to it by tapping the local community to participate.

Thomas' work feels more relevant than ever, so we checked in with him about what has changed, and what has stayed the same throughout his 20 year career.

Hank Willis Thomas "All Things Being Equal..." (2010) Courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York. © Hank Willis Thomas

How has the way you think about things changed in the last six months, if at all?

I think there's definitely a greater response and a greater resonance to the work that I've always been doing. My specific concern is, "Where do we go from here?" And I believe that peace and justice will prevail. I also think that this is a pretty frightening time when it comes to—I mean, look at what's happening in Portland, where the show started. It's a serious moment, and someone's got to put an end to this in a positive way.

Hank Willis Thomas "Guernica" (2016) Private Collection. Courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York. © Hank Willis Thomas

Do you label your work as protest art?

I don't. I think it does highlight protest, it's about protest, but all of it is not protest art. I've been looking at protests as a creative form of civic engagement and proactive advancement of society. For the past four years I've kind of reshaped the meaning of that work, which is largely around things that happened in the mid-20th century. So now 60 years later, those same images, those same stories being so relevant to oppression, there is that sense that history is repeating itself or at least that we haven't learned our lesson.

Hank Willis Thomas "I Am. Amen." (2009) Collection of Ulrich Museum of Art, Wichita State University. Image courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York. © Hank Willis Thomas

How do you describe your work?

I think my work is very much my life. So it's a product of my search, my quest for personhood. My quest for my own specific voice to be clear and to understand the world and make sense of it.

Hank Willis Thomas "The Cotton Bowl" from the series Strange Fruit (2011) Detroit Institute of Arts, Museum Purchase, W. Hawkins Ferry Fund. Image courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York. © Hank Willis Thomas

What's your process like?

I was always fascinated by the power of advertising to shape and influence our notions of what's important, who's important and who we want to be. And so for me, that has been the journey and it became more clear when I did the Unbranded series that I could look really critically at how advertising used prejudice to inform and shape our version of yourself through playing on our stereotypes and our need to be simple, clear and beautiful. And I wanted, more and more, to encourage myself and others to really engage deeply with the kind of, if not brainwashing, the potency of advertising and its ability to control our values through seductiveness.

You work as an artist, but you also have your ideas in other places, from fashion to billboards to museums.

Yeah, and I'm learning new mediums. It's such a learning process; the world has changed so dramatically in the past six months that all options have to be on the table for us to really get through this carefully.

How do you stay “conceptual” when reality is so crazy?

One of the pieces in the show is “Art Imitates Ads/ Imitates Life.” That's it, that's all of it.

Hank Willis Thomas “Strike” (2018) Private Collection. Image courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York. © Hank Willis Thomas

How does your personal work differ from For Freedoms?

My studio practice is all about me, right. Even when I don't do it all—all my work is collaborative—and For Freedoms and the Wide Awakes are ways to kind of more publicly collaborate, and people don't presume that my voice is the leading voice and think that I'm the only one doing this work because in reality, there are thousands of artists doing similar work that inspired me and have inspired me. My studio practice is just in that continuum, so we've been doing exhibitions and billboards and town halls, collaborations with artists and organizations across the world as a way to stake a claim for artists and civic life, and to make our work collectively something that people can see as an alternative to the typical propaganda that is that we've grown used to in our society. Because we add creativity to political speech it actually opens up doors and online on how we actually might engage in legislation and political life.

Hank Willis Thomas "Wounded Knee (red and gold)" [variation without flash] (2018) Private Collection. Image courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York. © Hank Willis Thomas

Last year you became a father. How has that changed you?

So that has been pretty enlightening, to say the least. The generational levels of it, I don't know, but like big dad and being not just me—I'm part of a legacy I would hope. And that will hopefully outlive me and live on for generations. And that the work that I make is speaking to someone else's life in a very different way than it was when I made it. I didn't conceive that my work might be something that someone 10 have 20 or 30 years ago might have to relate to and engage with it. It's part of my own biography. It also changes the way that I think about myself, even as a citizen at this time.

What's surprised you most about your career?

That somehow I've made a living doing it. I've just been following my dreams and trying to be genuine somehow, you know; I've been able to continue to do that for almost 20 years.

All Things Being Equal opens tomorrow at the Cincinnati Art Museum and runs through 8 November 2020.

Hero image "Public Enemy (II)" [variation with flash] (2017) by Hank Willis Thomas Courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York. © Hank Willis Thomas

KAREN DAY

A member of the global COOL HUNTING network of contributors.

Hank Willis Thomas: 'The work will not be complete in our lifetime'

The artist talks about the Black Lives Matter movement, his latest timely sculpture and why it's more important than ever for artists to use their voices to challenge power

Nadja Sayej

Thu 30 Jul 2020 10.56 EDT

In Atlanta, the BeltLine Eastside Trail recently saw a new addition to its landscape: a new public artwork by the Historic Fourth Ward Park, close to the birthplace of Dr Martin Luther King Jr.

Until 11 August, pedestrians will see a 28ft tall, 7,000lb Afro pick.

It's a sculpture by the New York artist Hank Willis Thomas called All Power to All People. As part of his project with Kindred Arts, the sculpture will tour cities across the US ahead of the presidential election in November.

“To me, the work is a celebration and a provocation,” Thomas told the Guardian. “It’s a symbol of community, strength, justice and belonging that aims to inspire action and demand social change.”

After its time in Atlanta, the sculpture will travel to Washington DC from 15-28 August, coinciding with the forthcoming Get Your Knee Off Our Necks: Commitment March on Washington on 28 August, led by the Rev Al Sharpton; the event marks the 57th anniversary of King’s I Have a Dream speech. The sculpture then travels to Los Angeles, Chicago and Philadelphia. It previously appeared on display outside the Africa Center in Manhattan last year.

In light of the Black Lives Matter protests and racist Confederate monuments and memorials removed in recent months, some wonder what the future of public art and monuments will look like. “Public monuments have a higher charge now,” said Thomas. “With all the things that have been happening with monuments across the country, this felt more important than ever.”

The first Afro comb was patented in 1969 by two African Americans, Samuel H Bundles Jr and Henry M Childrey. It was popularized by the Black Power movement and often designed with a clenched fist and a peace sign.

“The peace sign has been an element of black power. It was a time of the radical redefinition of beauty, the growing of our hair and the celebration of culture that was underappreciated,” said Thomas.

The sculpture in Atlanta. Photograph: Marc Turnley

The fist was added to many Afro combs as a nod to the Black Power salute that was popularized by the Black Panther party. At the time, it was known as the Black Power Afro pick hair comb and was manufactured by Antonio’s Manufacturing, founded by Anthony R Romani (who designed the Afro rake comb and the peace sign Afro pick in 1972).

“It is a uniting motif, worn as adornment, a political emblem and signature of collective identity,” said Thomas. “In light of ongoing, anti-black police brutality and a pandemic that disproportionately affects black individuals, it’s an urgent public art piece serving as a symbol of unity, pride, strength, perseverance, justice and belonging.”

The key, he says, is the peace sign at the heart of the Afro pick. “Even with the Black Panthers, what they wanted was peace, but there was a war on the community, so it was called the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense,” he adds. “I wanted to highlight this idea of the Black Power movement as always being a peace movement.”

Thomas is known for his recent public art projects, including Incarceration Nations: Writing on the Wall, where the artist and Dr Baz Dreisinger have projected writings by prisoners fearful of catching the coronavirus on to Manhattan’s criminal justice buildings. He is also working on the ongoing project, For Freedoms, an ongoing country-wide billboard art initiative co-founded with Eric Gottesman and Michelle Woo, which has provoked a debate around voting.

The new sculpture was inspired by the artist’s 2017 project, All Power to All People, a 9ft Afro pick the artist made for Mural Arts Philadelphia and Monument Lab.

Thomas's All Power to All People sculpture in Philadelphia.
Photograph: Matt Rourke/AP

It sat near Philadelphia City Hall, next to the monument of Frank Rizzo, the controversial conservative mayor and police chief who attacked the Black Panthers in the 1970s. The Rizzo monument was removed in June. “After that sculpture was removed, there were recent calls for my pick piece to take its place there,” said Thomas.

It traveled, too, to Burning Man, the annual event in Nevada’s Black Rock Desert, last summer. “The sculpture was at its best at Burning Man because there are less rules, so people could climb up inside it,” said Thomas.

“We had LED lights that made it change color at night. There was also a soundtrack that went along with it called Black Righteous Space, which has speeches and music from Afro Caribbean and African American movements of the past,” he adds. “Burning Man isn’t the most culturally diverse place, so it was monumental as a statement.”

Despite the recent wave of public art as a mere selfie op for Instagrammers, Thomas still believes that it can spark action, that art can influence the public vote. “We see how political public space is. What’s exciting about this work is that it’s very much a rallying call,” he said. “Having it tour during this election has extreme potency and power.”

Thomas’s first major retrospective will open 4 September at the Cincinnati Arts Museum. He recognizes that this new sculpture is timely amid the social upheaval storming the globe, even though he has been making political art for the past 20 years.

Photograph: Andrea Blanch

“It’s something I’m still reconciling with,” said Thomas. “It’s heartbreaking to think that it takes several murders by the people who are hired to serve and protect us in order for there to be true movement to understand, acknowledge something so basic, which is that black lives matter.

“I’ve always struggled with the necessity of even having to say that because it’s so obvious,” he said. “I am looking forward to the moment where a lot of things I’m talking about are the norm. How do we continue to redefine and open new doors for other people to get more access to liberty and justice?”

Many Americans are looking forward to changing the course of the country with the election, but Thomas says that might not be the ultimate answer. “A single election doesn’t matter,” he says. “Everything helps - even the current president helps because he helps show what’s at stake when we don’t engage.”

Thomas believes artists have an ability to see the future, that they can channel what they have seen through their artwork.

“It isn’t just artists, it’s activists, as well,” he said. “We may not see or be there for the final moment, as Martin Luther King Jr said on the night he was murdered: ‘I’ve seen the mountaintop. I might not get there with you.’

“I feel like that’s so prophetic, so frightening, but I understand more about what he’s saying,” said Thomas. “The road towards progress is always under construction. The work will not be complete in our lifetime.”

This article was amended on 5 August, 2020 to add Michelle Woo’s name to the co-founders of For Freedoms America is at a crossroads ...

... in the coming months, and the results will define the country for a generation. These are perilous times. Over the last three years, much of what the Guardian holds dear has been threatened - democracy, civility, truth.

The country is at a crossroads. Science is in a battle with conjecture and instinct to determine policy in the middle of a pandemic. At the same time, the US is reckoning with centuries of racial injustice - as the White House stokes division along racial lines. At a time like this, an independent news organisation that fights for truth and holds power to account is not just optional. It is essential.

Like many news organizations, the Guardian has been significantly impacted by the pandemic. We rely to an ever greater extent on our readers, both for the moral force to continue doing journalism at a time like this and for the financial strength to facilitate that reporting.

You've read more than 6 articles What's this? We would like to remind you how many Guardian articles you've enjoyed on this device. Can we continue showing you this? Yes, that's OK No, opt me out Please note you cannot undo this action or opt back in in the last nine months. We believe every one of us deserves equal access to fact-based news and analysis. We've decided to keep Guardian journalism free for all readers, regardless of where they live or what they can afford to pay. This is made possible thanks to the support we receive from readers across America in all 50 states.

As our business model comes under even greater pressure, we'd love your help so that we can carry on our essential work. If you can, support the Guardian from as little as $1 - and it only takes a minute. Thank you.

Deeper Truths: A Conversation with Hank Willis Thomas

by Antwaun Sargent

Love Over Rules,
2018.
View of billboard activation in Nashville, TN.

q/a

© LUFFORD PICKETT AND ALYSSA MEADOWS, © HANK WILLIS THOMAS, COURTESY THE ARTIST AND JACK SHAINMAN GALLERY, NEW YORK / PORTRAIT: ANDREA BLANCH

Hank Willis Thomas, who was recently awarded a Guggenheim Fellowship, has emerged as one of the most prolific artists of his generation. Formally trained as a photographer, over the last 15 years, he has considered the relationship we have to images and what they say about our priorities and privileges, focusing primarily on popular, found imagery from history, sport, and fashion. He recontextualizes so effectively that his work has changed how we see images that we often passively consume. In the early “Unbranded” series, for instance, he removed the language and logos from advertisements, leaving only the images. The gesture focused attention on the outsized influence corporations have in shaping common notions of race, gender, beauty, and sexuality.

The idea is to get at “a deeper truth,” says Thomas, who recently co-founded an art political-action committee called For Freedoms. This impulse has increasingly driven him to use photographs as the basis for a burgeoning sculptural practice rooted in social engagement. For him, “It’s all one... ‘Form is nothing more than an extension of content’ is what one of my professors once said.” The Truth Booth, an interactive installation that has traveled across the world, allowed participants to dialogue about questions concerning their communities; All Power to All People, a monumental Afro-pick planted outside City Hall in Philadelphia in 2017, was a poignant reminder of self-determination; and other sculptures, such as Strike, Liberty, and Die Dompas Moet Brand! (The Passport Must Burn!), often fabricated in fiberglass, steel, and bronze, isolated gestures and iconic moments found in photographs to draw attention to acts of destruction, power, and love.

Antwaun Sargent: I was reading through All Things Being Equal..., the monograph published in conjunction with your survey exhibition, on view at the Portland Art Museum in Oregon through January 12, 2020, and I came across the statement, “I’m much more influenced by Beyoncé than Picasso.” What do you mean by that?

Hank Willis Thomas: Even though my mother’s a curator and art historian, that wasn’t the driving force in my social identity. You and I, we grew up in what’s called the MTV Generation. We take our cues from people in popular culture. The audacity and, some might say, perfection that Beyoncé represents are qualities that I’ve always taken inspiration from.

AS: One of the strategies that you’ve employed across your career is the use of image archives—online, in libraries, in museum collections, and in magazines. How do you see your relationship to the found image?

HWT: I studied photography in the analog days and was really into it. My mother’s a photographer and a photo historian. But, in so many ways, I see myself as a product of my generation. Within about three years of graduating undergrad, the whole landscape shifted to digital. I had to reconsider not only my relationship to the camera, but also to images, because there were more photographs being taken in a split second than one could make sense of. Now everyone has an equal-quality camera in their pocket, and so everyone has the capacity to become a photographer. What does this mean in relation to making images, to understanding them, and how do they impact our lives? Do we think about the ubiquity of photographs and how we can start to distill meaning from them and maybe reshape them? Most of what we know about ourselves and our culture is really shaped through commercial images, through advertising and popular culture. I have used those images as the basis for my investigation of my own identity as well as the identity of this moment.

AS: It’s All a Question of Luck (2010) is a diptych of Josephine Baker and another black woman. The juxtaposition creates a dialogue between the images in which you can see the influence of Baker on the culture and the ways in which black femininity is portrayed over time. I always think about your work as a conversation with the ways in which blackness is represented and the power or powerlessness in that representation. When you are creating works like It’s All a Question of Luck, how are you thinking about questions of representation?

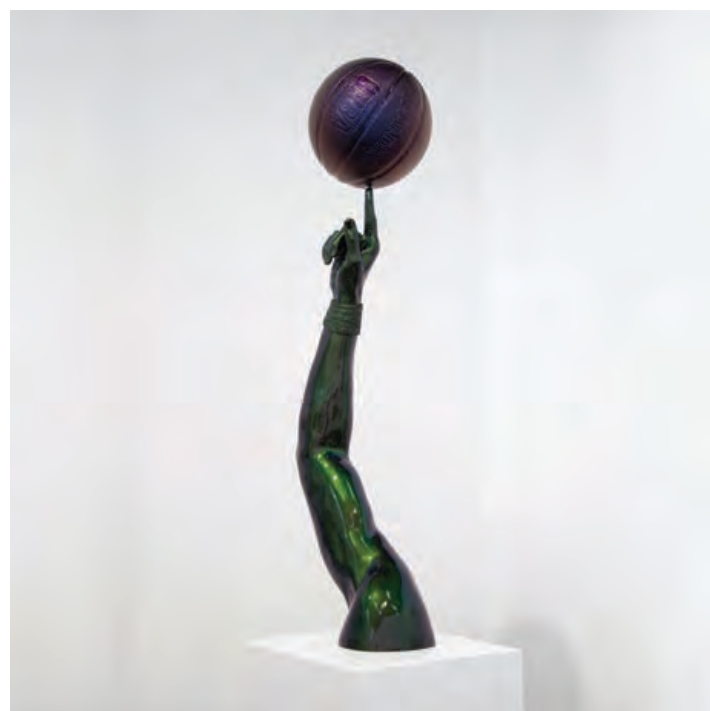

HWT: I’m always wondering, are we recycling old ideas or are we actually innovating? Is it exploitative or actually revolutionary? The story of Josephine Baker is in part about someone who’d been overlooked,

CLOCKWISE FROM TOP LEFT:
The Truth is I Love You*, 2015.
Aluminum lamppost sign with vinyl graphics on both sides, view of installation at Metrotech Commons, Brooklyn, NY.

All Power to All People*, 2017.
Aluminum and stainless steel,
98 x 43.5 x 2.5 in.

Strike*, 2018.
Stainless steel with mirrored finish,
32.5 x 31 x 7.5 in.

Liberty*, 2015.
Fiberglass and chameleon auto paint finish,
35 x 10 x 10 in.

“Sports is also a highly political landscape. When you think about many of the major advancements for disenfranchised people—African American, Native American, Latino, and women—many of those happened through sports.”

FROM ABOVE:
White Imitates Black,
2009.
Lenticular print,
40 x 30 in.

Branded Head,
2003.
Lambda photograph,
30 x 20 in.

especially as a black woman. She had to leave the United States and exoticize herself in order to be seen as beautiful. I'm also trying to excavate, looking beneath the layers to see what is the influence of making that image a real image.

AS: Over the last several years, you've used images that have shaped our imaginations and possibilities of identity to create sculpture. How has your changing relationship to the camera and its images informed this shift?

HWT: We live in a moment of 3D scanning and capture, motion capture, and mechanical reproductions. I guess there's a question I am trying to pose through the sculptures: Is it possible to have a phenomenal relationship to a historic or iconic moment? My first years making sculpture, I was looking at images from apartheid South Africa and trying to rationalize and relate to the tension in them—the sculptures were very much me trying to get myself and viewers a little bit closer to the history that we mostly see in two-dimensional black and white images from a “long time ago.” The works make you as a viewer present with whatever moment is being chosen or captured.

AS: In thinking about your shift to sculpture, the recent activity of your art political-action committee, For Freedoms, comes to mind. The 50 State Initiative, a campaign to bring artist-designed billboards to every state in America, operates in an in-between space. When you were conceptualizing that project, were you thinking sculpturally about how those billboards might consider an existing landscape?

HWT: Public advertising is very much an art form. It's not what we might call a high art form, but I think part of what we wanted to do, which included town halls, exhibitions, and billboards, was to encourage viewers and ourselves to reconsider public space and institutional space. By making these billboards as artworks, we were trying to change the meaning of what a billboard is and how it should function.

AS: What were some of the conversations that you wanted to have with the public through those particular objects?

For Freedoms,
Four Freedoms,
2018.

View of billboard
activation in
Des Moines, IA.

HWT: I think the question that I asked was literally, “What does the question look like in public space?” Meaning, most of these commercial advertising spaces are used exclusively to tell people where to go, what to buy, and who to be. Our billboards are framed as political, but most of what the artists do within their work is ask questions. We did not direct the billboards. We were just creating space for artists to do what they already do in their private studio practices but to present it in a new way. “Where Do We Go From Here?” is one of the questions on Eric Gottesman’s billboard. We are interested in rethinking the discourse that members of the public can have with an artist. With most art, these exchanges are supposed to happen in what people often see as exclusive white cubes or museums. But in this case, the same works found in museums are in public space. Hopefully they are raising the level of critical engagement around the images and the works we see in public space.

AS: The impression is that your work has shifted from being focused on subliminal language and messages carried in advertisements and popular imagery—in the “Branded” and “Unbranded” series and White Imitates Black (2009)—to being more concerned with overtly political images and messaging in Raise Up (2016) or For Freedoms.

HWT: All art is political. The question is: How do we define “political,” and how do we define “art”? I guess some people would see Branded Head and Scarred Chest (both 2003), which preceded “Unbranded,” as even more political. I think about the extraction of the political when we think about the billboards. One of the billboards that got censored by the billboard companies was Adam Pendleton’s work. They felt they couldn’t understand it on the surface, so therefore it was a threat.

AS: The Sword Swallower (2017) and Tip Off (2014) continue your fascination with sports. In these sculptures, you make the politics of sports the subject of the games, but it seems like you are drawn to the spectacle, too.

HWT: It’s the spectacle, but sports is also a highly political landscape. When you think about many of the major advancements for disenfranchised people—African American, Native American, Latino, and women—many of those happened through sports. When you think about Billie Jean King and even Michael Jordan, Jim Brown, and Muhammad Ali, it was really through their undeniable beauty, integrity, and creativity that the public was forced to engage with them as human beings.

AS: What's interesting to me is how the work grapples with multiple notions of what is political in society and art.

HWT: It's really about highlighting the fact that all art is political. When we talk about Picasso, why is his work important 100 years later? What's become centered as valuable, and who originates or seemed to originate ideas that are central to our society, is political. Most of what we know about ancient Greece and ancient Egypt, and even the Renaissance era, is through the art. So what is seen as art, who is seen as a valuable artist, and what is preserved are not only important but also hyper-political.

AS: Raise Up is situated in Montgomery, Alabama, on the grounds of the National Memorial for Peace and Justice, which is dedicated to those who lost their lives to lynching. I find the placement to be a significant gesture, both a political and poetic representation of a history of black struggle and freedom. When you are thinking about the installation of your sculpture in situ, what is that process like?

HWT: In that space, my sculpture is a small part of Bryan Stevenson's vision. Even though he doesn't see himself as an artist, his craft and his storytelling obviously create the platform and the opportunity for my work to be seen. It was his idea to place that specific sculpture within the context of the National Memorial for Peace and Justice. I had originally conceptualized the sculpture to be that size, but I never could've imagined that a few years later there'd be someone thinking more thoughtfully about its placement than I would.

AS: You're designing Boston's Martin Luther King Jr. memorial. It will feature the arms of King and his wife, Coretta Scott King, embracing in bronze. It is an untraditional monument in that it does not capture the 2019.

The Embrace,
Rendering of Boston's
Martin Luther King Jr.
memorial.

COURTESY MASS DESIGN GROUP, BOSTON AND HANK WILLIS THOMAS STUDIO

Hank Willis Thomas and Light Work,
US IS THEM THEY ARE US,
2018.

View of billboard
activation in Syracuse, NY.

VICTOR RIVERA. © HANK WILLIS THOMAS. COURTESY THE ARTIST AND JACK SHAINMAN GALLERY, NEW YORK

“ I’m always wondering, are we recycling old ideas or are we actually innovating? Is it exploitative or actually revolutionary? ” full likenesses of these Civil Rights icons.

HWT: I was inspired by a photograph that highlights the intimacy that they had with one another and the fact that they fell in love in Boston. How do we talk about, in a memorial, more than just two people? I was interested in their capacity for love and commitment and partnership. Their love shifted society. The way in which his arms are wrapped around hers was something I thought could be a poetic reminder for us to reflect on the greater history of partnership and love that is critical to freedom movements.

AS: It’s almost an abstraction of their love, of black love.

HWT: Unfortunately, we’ve become so accustomed to hearing Martin Luther King’s name that we no longer see him when we see images of him. We don’t recognize him as someone who was seen as the most dangerous man in the country at the peak of his impact. How do we connect the deeper part of his legacy, which is in part the partnership with Coretta Scott King? I didn’t want to make it about idealistic, perfect people, but about their bond. I felt that by focusing on the arms, I could focus more clearly on the bond.

AS: It reminds me of Love Over Rules, a phrase that has come to define your life in a lot of ways. It was the theme of your wedding, and you subsequently made it into a neon light installation, installed in downtown San Francisco and in the lobby of the Brooklyn Museum. Both of these works emphasize the ways in which your practice is also an investigation of language.

HWT: I think about a For Freedoms billboard I saw in September that said, “words shape reality.” What you choose to photograph, make into a sculpture, or tell in a story in many ways dictates our understanding of things. If we’re not questioning those words or reconsidering those meanings, we could also not be understanding deeper truths about what we’re hearing or seeing. How do you reconsider and reimagine our relationship to everyday objects or overused tropes? How do we start to give ourselves new meaning or understanding? That’s exactly what I try to do. I try to bring history forward and to take the things we already know or think we know and show them in a new light, to not only view them but also to broaden understanding.

AS: The newer retro-reflective vinyl works of iconic protest images in some ways do exactly that—they stand out as a way of telling the viewer to engage history. To see the work, you have to flash a light on it. The images are confrontational. You flash a light on “I tried to see a friendly face somewhere in the crowd” #1 (2017) and there’s Elizabeth Eckford integrating Little Rock Central High School in 1957. The crowd is washed out in paint, so you have to focus on the enormity of that moment in history.

HWT: The images are printed on material that only works by being illuminated through the perspective of light from a specific angle or view. I’m interested in how what we choose to shine light on affects what’s visible—that’s extremely relevant when we think about historical images. Sometimes you can make something invisible unless you shine a light on it, and then it becomes highly visible. I’m playing with the tension of hyper-visibility and invisibility. It’s about the narratives we shine a light on and the ones we don’t, and the people we shine a light on and the ones we don’t.

AS: What questions do you still have left to ask?

HWT: What are we buying into when we choose to buy products based off an image that’s telling us who and what is important? What are we relinquishing when we allow notions of ourselves and others to be shaped by corporate agendas? ■■■

Search

Artist Hank Willis Thomas' "Unity" Takes Its Place In Downtown Brooklyn

About DDC News Contact

Artist Hank Willis Thomas' "Unity" Takes Its Place In Downtown Brooklyn

Commissioned through the City's Percent for Art program as part of a broader revitalization of the Tillary Street corridor

DDC: Shoshana Khan, 718-391-1251, KhanSho@ddc.nyc.gov

(Brooklyn, NY - November 12, 2019) The NYC Department of Design and Construction (DDC) and NYC Department of Cultural Affairs (DCLA) today announced the installation of "Unity," a new, monumental public artwork that was commissioned as part of the ongoing reconstruction of Tillary Street in downtown Brooklyn. Installed on Saturday, November 9, on the western median of the Tillary Street and Adams Street intersection, the piece welcomes travelers from the Brooklyn Bridge and creates a new landmark at this high-profile location.

"Unity" points skyward in downtown Brooklyn

The sculpture was commissioned under the City's Percent for Art program, and is part of the comprehensive reconstruction of the Tillary Street area that DDC is managing for the NYC Department of Transportation. The $46.5 million, two-phase effort will simplify street geometry, create substantial protected space for pedestrians and bicyclists by widening sidewalks, install planted medians throughout the area and create a new public plaza at the intersection of Tillary Street, Clinton Street and Cadman Plaza West. There will also be upgraded water mains, traffic signals, street lighting, hydrants, manholes and wayfinding signs throughout the project area.

This large-scale sculpture of a bronze arm communicates a myriad of ideas about individual and collective identity, ambition and perseverance. The piece measures 22.5 feet in height, emerges from the ground and points towards the sky, echoing the Statue of Liberty's iconic gesture.

A crane lowers “Unity” into place on Tillary Street in Brooklyn

“Many DDC projects include a ‘Percent for Art’ component as a way to beautify our urban environment,” said DDC Commissioner Lorraine Grillo. “The Tillary Street reconstruction projects will also calm traffic and add pedestrian space, making the area safer and more inviting to pedestrians and keeping with Mayor de Blasio’s Vision Zero goals.”

“Works of public art shape and define open spaces across New York City,” said Kendal Henry, Director of the NYC Department of Cultural Affairs’ Percent for Art program. “With ‘Unity,’ Hank Willis Thomas captures a huge range of meaning with a simple form, conveying a sense of uplift, hope, and a little bit of Brooklyn attitude at this prominent site. We are thrilled to join our partners at DDC and DOT to install this instantly iconic work of public art.”

“This sculpture is an homage to and celebration of the unique and multi-faceted character of the borough of Brooklyn,” said artist Hank Willis Thomas. “The spirit of Brooklyn has always been about upward mobility and connection to roots. The large-scale sculpture of a bronze arm pointing toward the sky is intended to convey to a wide audience a myriad of ideas about individual and collective identity, ambition, and perseverance.”

“Brooklyn is a borough of history, character and distinction,” said City Council Majority Leader Laurie Cumbo. “With over 2 million people shaping the culture and vibrancy of our great borough, I am so delighted that Hank Willis Thomas’s ‘Unity’ sculpture lives in Downtown Brooklyn, to remind us of the importance of togetherness, persistence and possibility. As Brooklynites, I encourage us to view this new landmark as a renewal of that Brooklyn pride which we carry daily. Let it also call us to walk the path collectively toward success, growth, and enhanced unity.”

The artist worked closely with UAP Polich Tallix, located in Rock Tavern, New York throughout the fabrication of “Unity.” The foundry was provided with a 3D file of the artwork, which was then milled into 10-pound foam patterns. UAP Polich Tallix then used multiple fine art bronze casting processes to create the sculpture, which subsequently received a patina finish and was transported from their facilities directly to the installation site. The Downtown Brooklyn Partnership will be responsible for ongoing maintenance of the work.

"It's wonderful to have permanent public art of this caliber, by a Brooklyn-based artist, at a location where so many make their entrance to the borough," said Downtown Brooklyn Partnership President Regina Myer. "Hank Willis Thomas' monumental Unity will serve as a memorable landmark, and as a symbol of Brooklyn's triumphant spirit. The City's ongoing investment into the area's public art is recognition of Downtown Brooklyn's transformation into a thriving destination, and we are thankful to DCLA, DDC, and DOT, for their work and commitment to the project."

About the NYC Department of Design and Construction

The Department of Design and Construction is the City’s primary capital construction project manager. In supporting Mayor de Blasio’s long-term vision of growth, sustainability, resiliency, equity and healthy living, DDC provides communities with new or renovated public buildings such as firehouses, libraries, police precincts, and new or upgraded roads, sewers and water mains in all five boroughs. To manage this $14 billion portfolio, DDC partners with other City agencies, architects and consultants, whose experience bring efficient, innovative and environmentally-conscious design and construction strategies to City projects. For more information, please visit nyc.gov/ddc.

The Inquirer

There's a giant sculpture of Joel Embiid's arm ... in Brooklyn?

by Nick Vadala, Updated: December 6, 2019

CHRISTINA HORSTEN/PICTURE-ALLIANCE/DPA/AP IMAGES

Joel Embiid may not have had the best performance in Thursday's game against the Washington Wizards, but the Sixers power forward has been immortalized forever thanks to a new sculpture in Brooklyn — or, at least his arm has.

New York City debuted artist Hank Willis Thomas' Unity in downtown Brooklyn last month, Brooklyn Paper reports. The sculpture depicts a 22-foot arm pointing to the sky with a finger raised, and was modeled from a three-dimensional scan of Embiid's right arm.

hankwillisthomas
Brooklyn Bridge

View Profile

View More on Instagram

6,548 likes

hankwillisthomas

Unity, 2019

Today we installed my first permanent public art sculpture in the city I'm from! It's at the intersection of Tillary & Adams at the end of the Brooklyn Bridge. So epic and surreal. I'm so honored and humbled to see this dream become a reality. I'm truly grateful to all of the incredible people who made this piece of reality through so many years of hard work and collaboration!

view all 523 comments

Add a comment...

Unity uses the Philly-based Cameroonians' appendage as an "homage to, and celebration of, the unique and multifaceted character of the borough of Brooklyn," Thomas said in a statement.

“The spirit of Brooklyn has always been about upward mobility and connection to roots,” Thomas said. “The large-scale sculpture of a bronze arm pointing toward the sky is intended to convey to a wide audience a myriad of ideas about individual and collective identity, ambition, and perseverance.”

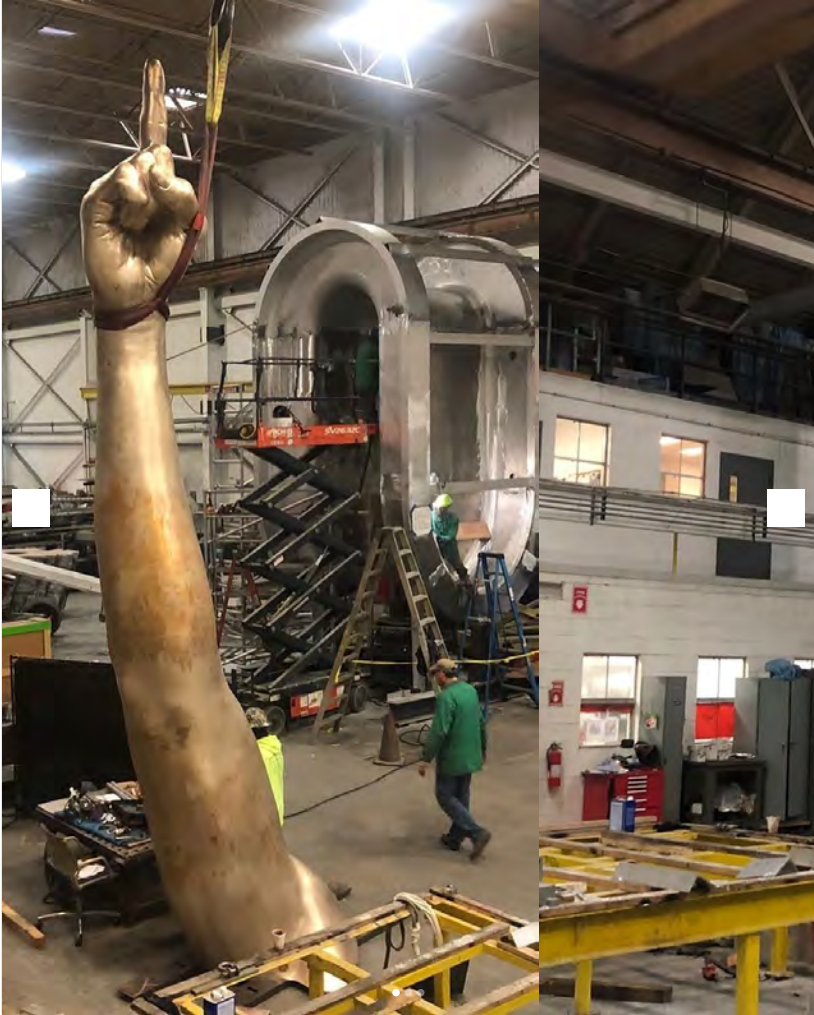

As Thomas wrote earlier this year on Instagram, work on the piece began in 2014 — the same year Embiid signed his rookie contract with the 76ers. Thomas later told the New York University Tisch School of the Arts that Embiid wound up being involved almost by chance.

hankwillisthomas

Brooklyn, New York

View Profile

View More on Instagram

3,400 likes

hankwillisthomas

Unity, 2019 coming to a city near you after 5 years! It's about the process!#longgame

view all 177 comments

Add a comment...

“I had a studio visit with some people and they saw that I was doing a sculpture, so I was doing molds and casts with body parts of NBA players. They were like, ‘Do you need anybody else?’ and I was like, ‘Sure!’” Thomas said. “Then they said, ‘Well, there’s this kid, he hasn’t started playing yet, but I’m pretty sure he’s gonna be good. You should reach out to him.’ And that was Joel Embiid.”

The project reportedly cost $284,000, and will remain on display in Brooklyn for at least 30 years, Brooklyn Paper reports. Now, missing out on Embiid starring alongside Adam Sandler in a movie doesn’t seem so bad.

Thomas has his own Philadelphia roots: In 2017, he created a sculpture of a 12-foot Afro pick, called All Power to the People, which was displayed near the controversial Frank Rizzo statue in Thomas Paine Plaza during the Monuments Lab project. While installing the sculpture, he told The Inquirer that his maternal grandfather was a Philadelphia police officer who was in the Police Academy with Rizzo.

Posted: December 6, 2019 - 11:53 AM

Nick Vadala | @njvadala | nvadala@inquirer.com

OREGON ARTSWATCH

OREGON'S ARTS & CULTURE NEWS

Hank Willis Thomas: How to unmake race

The Portland Art Museum has staged the first retrospective of Hank Willis Thomas, who addresses the complexity of race in America in "All Things Being Equal..."

December 3, 2019 // CULTURE, FEATURED, VISUAL ART // Laurel Reed Pavic

The neon above the main entrance of the Portland Art Museum reads "LOVERULES." Illuminated in different combinations, it reads both "love overrules" and "love over rules." The neon work, loaned by Jordan Schnitzer, sets the tone for Hank Willis Thomas's show All Things Being Equal... that opened October 12 and will run through January 12, 2020.

Hank Willis Thomas (American, born 1976), Loverules, 2019. Neon.
Courtesy of Jordan D. Schnitzer. © Hank Willis Thomas, photo courtesy of Portland Art Museum

Thomas is a photographer and conceptual artist whose work explores race, the language of advertising, and the power of images to shape culture and historical narrative. All Things Being Equal... is his first major retrospective. It brings together 15 years of the artist's work and cements Thomas's role as an artist who asks questions and poses answers about American history and the American present.

The show is a big moment for the Portland Art Museum and co-curators Julia Dolan and Sara Krajewski. To host this sort of retrospective for an artist of this status establishes the museum as an important venue for contemporary art. The show has been written up in the New York Times, Artnet, and the Observer, which stated "this show unequivocally places the Portland Art Museum in Oregon on the contemporary art map." It is the culmination of several years of work for Dolan and Krajewski, who, in addition to curating the show, secured funding from multiple prestigious sources and co-authored a handsome catalog with Aperture. It is equally an opportunity for viewers to consider images and race in a different way.

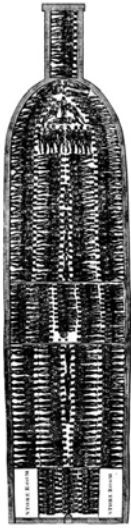

Though his work deals with race and Thomas contends that there is no stronger power in the universe than Black joy, he is equally adamant that race is an invention or myth designed to justify inequality and to propel stereotypes into widespread assumptions about how people are. Thomas says of race, "it is only real because we were taught to make it real."

Krajewski and Dolan have divided the exhibition into thematic rather than chronological sections, though the trajectory of the exhibition suggests some sense of progression in the artist's career as well. The first section, Branded, displays mostly older work, and the gallery directly before exiting to the gift shop, Trouble the Water, showcases more recent work. Some works, such as the lenticular prints and neon sign in Pitch Blackness/Off Whiteness, are clearly contained, but others intermingle, and in general the divisions and their significance are not always clear.

Branded displays the advertising and some of the sports-related works with which Thomas is most associated. The clever recasting of advertisements piques the viewer's interest with a sense of "oh yes, I remember that" and then hits them with an "oh, but not like that," with the familiar ads altered by historical fact. Absolut Power from 2003 fills the bottle silhouette from the vodka brand's long-running marketing campaign with a diagram of a cargo hold of a slave ship. Afro-American Express of 2004 is a credit card using the green background and font of American Express but substituting the central image for an image of slaves and medallions of the famous "Am I not a man and a brother?" kneeling figure. Chained slaves serve as a border.

Advertising features prominently in Thomas's early works. He graduated with an MFA from California College of the Arts in 2004 and the early works in this show date from about the same time. Of the advertising works, Priceless #1 serves as a bridge between Branded and Remember Me and takes the form of the MasterCard "Priceless" campaign, listing a bunch of things that can be bought and one that can't, and identifying the last intangible as "priceless." Set at a funeral, the sparse ad listing includes a three-piece suit, new socks, and a gold chain but also a 9 mm pistol and a bullet for 60 cents. The intangible is "picking the perfect casket for your son."

Though it uses the language of advertising, Priceless #1 is shaped by the artist's immediate biography. The backdrop of the ad is a personal photograph taken at his cousin Songha Willis's funeral after he was murdered over a gold chain in Philadelphia. Songha's death in 2000 changed Thomas's life and shaped his career and understanding of art: "The word 'art' means something different to me now. It offers a little bit of hope for answers, or at least poses better questions." In the same space as Priceless #1 is the video Winter in America, in which Thomas and co-creator Kambui Olujimi use G.I. Joe action figures to restage the interactions and robbery that led to Songha's death.

ABSOLUT POWER.

Hank Willis Thomas (American, born 1976), Absolut Power, 2003. Inkjet print on canvas, 53 × 34 inches. Collection of Williams College Museum of Art. Image courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York. © Hank Willis Thomas

There are two other works in the show directly related to Songha's murder, though the link is established by content rather than proximity. The landing of the main staircase houses Bearing Witness: Murder's Wake, 38 portraits of people directly affected by Songha's death. In the sculpture court is 14,719 (2018) which consists of 16 banners with stars representing the 14,719 people who were shot and killed by someone else in the United States in 2019. The banners engulf the viewer. Standing in the center of the overlapping rings of banners, the banners make the enormity of the plague of gun violence in this country inescapable. Each star represents one life cut short, but that life connects to so many others. In Thomas's words, "It is impossible to measure the magnitude and impact of this societal loss."

Hank Willis Thomas (American, born 1976), 14,719 (2018), 2019. Embroidered fabric panels. © Hank Willis Thomas, photo courtesy of Portland Art Museum.

The section What Goes Without Saying includes works from Thomas's Unbranded advertising series: Reflections in Black by Corporate America, 1968-2008 and A Century of White Women, 1915-2015. The Unbranded series followed Thomas's earlier Branded work: Rather than altering ads, here Thomas strips away the advertising copy and product identification and leaves only the images of the people. The resulting enlargements of the ads then can focus on the ideas presented rather than the products on offer. "I realized that ads are never really about the product," Thomas explains in the catalog: "It's about what you get people to buy into through the language and the images and the stories you tell." Thomas reveals the way that images naturalize ideas about gender or race: the Black man with no shirt and plaid pants, the white mother baking muffins, the Black man with the cigar on a rattan throne flanked by two white women.

Hank Willis Thomas (American, born 1976), Slack
Power/Unbranded: Reflections in Black Corporate America
 1968–2008, 1969/2006. Chromogenic print. 34 × 30 inches.
 Private Collection. Image courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York. © Hank Willis Thomas

It may be tempting to claim that the ubiquity of advertising or the rapid circulation of digital images has enabled this outsized capacity of images to shape cultural norms, but this is far from a modern phenomenon. In the fourth century BCE, Alexander the Great made sure that everyone in his empire knew he was destined to rule by distributing coins stamped with his (probably embellished) likeness and his fabulously flowing locks. People overwhelmingly think Jesus was white because artists in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance depicted him that way—against any reasonable understanding of geography and skin tone.

Images have played an outsized role in the United States in the perpetuation of racial stereotypes. In his article “Creating an Image in Black: the Power of Abolition Pictures,” John Stauffer recounts that in the mid-19th century, the famous former slave and abolitionist, Frederick Douglass, hailed photography as a tool in the fight in combating the belief in Black inferiority that characterized the antebellum era: “The vast majority of white artists degraded or dehumanized blacks when representing them. Most white Americans in the antebellum era believed that blacks were innately inferior, incapable of self-government, and thus unable to participate in civil society. They used pictures—though not photography—to show it.” Photography, in contrast, offered a more authentic or true representation.

Douglass lauded daguerreotypes because of their objectivity and ability to “penetrate the perceiver’s soul as well as his mind.” In retrospect this seems woefully optimistic, but photography was a new technology and even in our jaded regard for images, it is possible to understand Douglass’s viewpoint.

The belief that photography was able to eradicate racial distortion had lost some of its luster by the turn of the century, but W.E.B. DuBois maintained that photography could be instrumental in changing societal views on African Americans. In fact, the exhibit that DuBois put together for the Paris Exposition Universelle of 1900, The American Negro Exhibit, included photographs of African Americans as well as data charts illustrating the Black experience. A selection of photos and data charts from DuBois’s groundbreaking exhibit is on view at the Portland Art Museum as part of Color Line: Black Excellence on the World Stage. This small show opened in June as a corollary to the Paris 1900 show but remains open through the end of the Thomas show. It is an illuminating pairing here as it offers viewers another opportunity to consider how images construct society.

Examining this multivalent power of pictures is one of the great strengths of Thomas’s work. While many of the works in the second floor galleries center on advertising, the bulk of the works in the first floor galleries show Thomas’s engagement with the photographic archive and how it shapes history and historical memory. Thomas may have been predisposed to this field as his mother, Deborah Willis, is a photography curator, historian, and author of (among other things) a book titled Reflections in Black: A History of Black Photographers 1840 to the Present.

Dolan and Krajewski have titled the larger section Trouble the Water, and it includes Thomas’s Punctum sculptures, his Retroreflectives series, and other works that use photographs as a point of departure. Trouble the Water is also the name of a 2013 work by Thomas that takes its title from a spiritual whose lyrics are thought by historians to be a code for people fleeing slavery via the Underground Railroad. Thomas's composition arranges triangular fragments of a photograph from a 1949 Pentecostal baptism to create a quilt pattern. The quilt pattern further associates the work with the Underground Railroad—patterned quilts were used as a coded signal system to communicate during the flight northward. This work and the others in the second gallery use photographs in ways that extend their immediate point of reference.

Hank Willis Thomas (American, born 1976), Trouble the Water, 2013. Mounted digital c-prints and stained African Mahogany, 53 × 53 × 2 3/4 inches. Courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York. © Hank Willis Thomas

The Punctum sculptures use philosopher Roland Barthes's idea of the "punctum" of a photograph, the detail that "pierces" the viewer and continues to affect even after viewing. The sculptures isolate a component of an unseen photograph, leaving only the affecting detail. Amandla (2014) consists of a white-cuffed forearm and raised fist thrust out of a yellow metal door. The disembodied gesture conveys defiance, especially against the indication of institutional power evoked by the paneled door. The title "amandla" means "power" in the Nguni languages of south Africa and associates the work with the struggle against apartheid.

Apartheid in South Africa is the inspiration for two other works from the Punctum series: Die Dompas Moet Brand! (The Passbook Must Burn!) from 2013 and Raise Up from 2014. Until 1986, Black South Africans had to carry identity passbooks that restricted their travel and job prospects. Burning these passbooks was a frequent occurrence at anti-apartheid protests. In Die Dompas Moet Brand! bronze arms hold the detested booklets over a pile of ashes. Even without a familiarity with the South African passbook system, the sculpture is affecting.

Hank Willis Thomas (American, born 1976), Die Dompas Moet Brand! (The Passbook Must Burn!), 2013. Bronze and copper shim, dimensions variable. Installation view. Courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York. © Hank Willis Thomas

Part of the “pierce” of both Amandla and Die Dompas Moet Brand! (The Passbook Must Burn!) is the life-sizedness of the gesturing limbs. In Amandla, the forearm/fist is made of silicon, which gives a realistic fleshiness against the cold metal door. The hands in Die Dompas are made of bronze but still capture the disdain with which the disembodied hands dangle the fluttering pages over the ashes.

Raise Up, from 2014, demonstrates the ability for the meaning of images to evolve and change. The source for the sculpture is a 1967 photograph by Ernest Cole called Mine Recruitment. The photograph shows 13 Black men, all but one of whom are nude, standing against a wall with their arms raised above their heads. Taken during a group medical exam for employment in a mine, the photograph shows figures stripped of dignity and humanity. Raise Up reduces the number of figures to 10 and crops the figures so that the focus is the top of the mens’ heads and their arms raised overhead.

Hank Willis Thomas (American, born 1976), Raise Up, 2014. Bronze, 112 1/5 × 9 4/5 × 4 inches. Private Collection. Image courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York. © Hank Willis Thomas

Thomas made this sculpture in early 2014 based on the 1967 photograph. The gesture of arms raised overhead gained urgent contemporary resonance in the summer of 2014 when 18-year-old Michael Brown was shot and killed by a police officer in Ferguson, Missouri. The raised-arms gesture, along with the phrase “Hands up, don’t shoot,” became a protest cry associated with Black Lives Matter. Thomas’s sculpture took on new meaning, so much so that now the connection to the original photograph and apartheid in South Africa is somehow secondary. The version of the sculpture in Portland is smaller than life-sized, and while it pierces the viewer, the full-sized version recently installed at the National Memorial for Peace and Justice in Montgomery, Alabama, is devastating.

The relationship of the viewer to the image and its potency is equally at the heart of Thomas’s Retroreflectives series. Viewers are encouraged to take out their phones and shine their flash on the image. That reveals a salient detail and blurs out the rest of the composition. Upon flash exposure, Refusal (2018) highlights a single figure with his arms crossed in a crowd giving the Nazi salute from a 1936 photograph. Freedom for Soweto (2018) uses a photograph from 1976 and focuses attention on a boy with his arms raised and hands showing V or peace signs.

At first blush, the phone manipulations seemed gimmicky to me, an excuse for people to use their phones in the museum—like bowler hats for selfies in front of a Magritte or something. But taken in conjunction with Thomas’s other work and the general direction of his line of inquiry, I’m inclined to say instead that it is another strategy for thinking through images—how they work, how people relate to images of history, and how the images create historical memory.

The flash reveal is not the only strategy Thomas employs in his consideration of this line of inquiry. In Two Little Prisoners (2014), the figures of a crouching white police officer and two standing Black children are cropped out of a photograph and set against a large mirror. Viewers necessarily become part of the scene by positioning themselves to look. Ain’t Gonna Let Nobody Turn Us Around (2015-2016) is a collage of photographs on smaller mirrored panels that mimic the reflective metal surface of early daguerreotypes and also incorporate the viewer’s reflection into the scene. In Wounded Knee (red and gold) (2018), Thomas obscures a 1973 photograph with undulating strokes of paint.

All are ways of asking viewers to examine their own role in interpreting a photograph: by manipulating with a flash, by being incorporated in a mirror, or by peering through a distortion. Seeing is never passive or neutral, and neither is what we remember or how those memories build up upon one another to make history.

Although the artworks directly pulled from the photographic archive provide ample fodder for thought, my favorite departed from the source image a step further than the Retroreflectives works. I am, Amen is inspired by a photograph from 1968 taken by Ernest Withers at a sanitation workers strike in Memphis, Tennessee. The photo bears special significance in the history of the civil rights movement as Martin Luther King Jr. was in Memphis for the sanitation workers strike and was assassinated only days later. In the photo, a phalanx of Black striking workers hold identical signs emblazoned with the words “I am a man.” Thomas uses the framework of the original sign to make two rows of 10 signs each that read left to right as a poem that begins with “I am ⅓ a man” and ends with “I am. Amen.” The final statement is on a banner on the front of the museum along with the neon LOVERULES.

Hank Willis Thomas (American, born 1976), I Am, Amen., 2009. Liquitex on canvas, 25 1/4 × 19 × 1/4 × 2 1/4 inches each. Installation view. Collection of Ulrich Museum of Art, Wichita State University. Image courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York. © Hank Willis Thomas Advertisements are not just about what is being sold, and images of the past aren’t about historical events. Instead, they reveal interpretations of historical events that shape the present and ideas about how the world operates: What pierces? What do you remember? What do you build a worldview on? Thomas’s statement about advertisement—“It’s about what you get people to buy into through the language and the images and the stories you tell”—rings just as true when applied to the photographic archive as it does to advertisements.

The Portland Art Museum has gone to great lengths to reach out to the Black community in Portland around the occasion of this exhibition. Ella Ray, the Kress Interpretive Fellow/Community Partnerships Coordinator, has created a robust schedule of programming and events including the opening night Critical Conversation. Partners throughout the exhibition include The Numberz (96.7 FM), Oregon Justice Resource Center, King School Museum of Contemporary Art (KSMoCA), Portland in Color, Don’t Shoot Portland, and We + Black. There is a Community Partners in Residence Space in the upper gallery that includes an exhibition and zine titled An Altar to Alter: A transcendent experience in Black Feminine Art and Healing that features photographs by Portland artist Intisar Abioto.

On the occasion of a major exhibition that deals with race, Portland is eager to engage with the issues raised by Thomas's work. The city wants to live up to its liberal and inclusive image and is cognizant of the many ways that ideal is thinly gilded onto an uglier past. Tickets to the opening night Critical Conversation in the sunken ballroom in the Mark Building sold out; there was overflow in the Whitsell Auditorium. People are turning out to see the exhibition in droves. There are big flashing letters on the front of the building! Love overrules!

But our good intentions are not enough. In the Q&A section at the end of the Critical Conversation, in one of the last questions of the night someone asked the artist how he felt having his work shown in "the star of the white utopia" of Portland, Oregon. The person pointed out that the majority of the people in the audience were white and suggested that Black people were only welcome in the city "as long as we are artistic or entertaining." The murmurs of assent confirmed this was not an outlying opinion.

Thomas responded that he didn't believe in race, that one can't know anything by looking at the color of someone's skin and continued: "What I'm trying to struggle with is knowing that my ideas won't save me but also that my anger won't either. The only thing that will save me is my love for other people and my ability to see beyond all the things I've been trained to hate." He finished that statement with "But I don't live here," opening up the possibility that unseeing race may be harder to do in Oregon than other places.

I do live here and was one of the many white faces in the audience. Racism is an abstraction for me but I am intimately familiar with the naive optimism of white liberals. We want to believe that we couldn't possibly be racist, which was a problem of the past or in other less enlightened places. We want to believe the fact that this exhibition is here and so well attended exonerates previous bias in the museum or us for benefitting from white privilege. It's the same hope that led us to claim that Obama's 2008 election heralded a post-racial society.

Even in the face of events like Ferguson in 2014, we shared the photo taken in Portland of Devonte Hart embracing Sgt. Bret Barnum. That photo, first published by OregonLive, of a Black child hugging a white police officer was shared on Facebook 440,000 times. It tapped into our dream that race problems have a fix. If we all just hugged each other more, it would be fine. But the irony of that viral photograph is that while it seemed one thing in the moment and it was shared as what we wanted it to be, reality proved otherwise. Institutional racism is a fact and cannot be fixed by a hug or a Black Lives Matter yard sign. Good intentions don't erase our naïveté.

Race is a fiction, but that fiction has been propagated and circulated and layered upon in events and memories in this country for so long that it is a reality. Thomas's work asks us to consider the mechanisms that conspired to make race so we can better understand how to unmake it in the future.

The title of the show, All Things Being Equal... ends with an ellipsis signaling that it is the beginning of a statement, something must follow for the thought to be complete. It is as appropriate for a mid-career retrospective as it is for the Portland Art Museum or for Portlanders. The conversation has been opened but the conclusion remains unknown.

ART

Hank Willis Thomas Opens Up Space for Interpretation, Which Is Sometimes Risky

When we have more opportunity to interact with art on our own terms, there are more places to hide from its difficult truths, particularly viewers who have the privilege to do so.

Erin Langner November 26, 2019

Hank Willis Thomas, "Black Righteous Space" (2012), interactive video, dimensions variable, installation view (Private Collection, image courtesy the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York, © Hank Willis Thomas)

PORTLAND, Ore. — The night I went to see Hank Willis Thomas: All Things Being Equal... I found the Portland Art Museum flooded with people museums often hope to draw in: a visibly diverse, casually fashionable set of 20- and 30-somethings — a group I rarely encountered at PAM on past visits from Seattle. They brought a palatable excitement to the first mid-career survey of the Brooklyn-based artist Hank Willis Thomas, who rose to prominence in the early 2000s through his conceptual photography and has become increasingly public-facing in his work.

I experienced a marked shift from the exhibition's buzzy atmosphere inside a darkened room adjacent to the exhibition's entrance, where projected distortions of an animated Confederate flag flashed across a screen. Thomas's deeply layered installation "Black Righteous Space" (2012) filtered the flag through the red, black, and green colors of the Black Power Movement, its pulsating, kaleidoscopic patterns controlled by a playlist of songs, speeches, and dialogue by over 50 Black speakers and performers, ranging from James Baldwin to Kanye West. Standing before the screen was a microphone — an invitation for words and disruptions from viewers during intermittent pauses between recordings.

Exhibition entrance, Hank Willis Thomas: All Things Being Equal... (photo by the author for Hyperallergic)

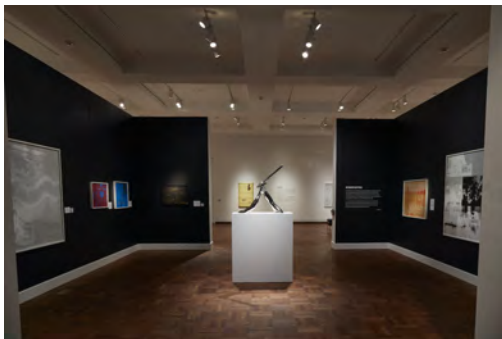

I watched visitors read the label, settle into chairs, whisper among themselves. But, other than a man who approached the mic and flashed a peace sign for a photo, no one took up the artist's invitation to participate. I wondered how much this had to do with being in Portland. As the exhibition's co-curator Julia Dolan articulated, "In terms of Oregon's complicated history with race and, in particular, with Blackness and the exclusionary laws that were written into the constitution...

this is an ideal city for the types of messages Thomas calls to in his work." In light of this, I wondered if the interactions might have differed when this piece was shown somewhere associated with political activism like San Francisco, or in Norfolk, Virginia, where the work was previously on view and opened two days after the Charleston church massacre. Were people there more willing to take ownership of the space Thomas opened for us?

Hank Willis Thomas, "Branded Head," from the series B®anded (2003), Chromogenic print, 99 × 52 × 3 inches (Private Collection, image courtesy the Moving through the thematically arranged presentation of over 90 works, including photographs, videos, installations, sculptures, and other conceptual pieces, I found myself returning to the evolving nature of space that Thomas creates for his viewer — the fluctuations in how much room he withholds or allots for us to participate and generate our own meaning within his work. At one end of the spectrum were the Branded photographs, a series in which he adapts commercial ads to question their motivations and histories. These pieces illuminate what exhibition co-curators Dolan and Sara Krajewski told me about their approach to interpretation in the exhibition: “The work does the work.” Krajewski elaborated, “Thomas’s work is accessible because the visual system he’s calling upon is one accessed by people in their daily lives.” Among the most moving of these is Thomas’s iconic “Branded Head” (2003), a glossy, oversized, black-and-white photograph in which a Nike swoosh brands the scalp of a faceless African American man — an image that tears apart the familiar language of advertising and seamlessly reconstructs it in a way that attunes our eye to its previously invisible power dynamics between the sports industry, Black athletes, the history of slavery, and us, as image consumers. But, I also found myself breezing through some Branded images because their message felt so clear, there was no “work” — no active engagement — required of me beyond a passive consumption.

Hank Willis Thomas: All Things Being Equal... installation view (image courtesy the Portland Art Museum)

When I asked Thomas about his work’s relationship with the viewer, he said, “I think it’s become more intentional for me to try to encourage and implicate the viewer in the making of the work. Viewer participation is what gives work value and credibility.” This intention came through clearly in Thomas’s more recent Retroflectives series, for which archival photographs are reproduced as screen prints coated in a vinyl surface of light-reflecting glass beads the artist uses to obscure the original images; their full contents can only be seen as the viewer illuminates them, typically by taking flash photo. The experience is startlingly affective in works like “What happened on that day really set me on a path (red and blue)” (2018), which appears to depict a man and young woman walking among a crowd. However, my flash exposed

Douglas Martin's photograph of Dorothy Counts on her way to a previously all-white high school in 1957 and the mob of angry white men surrounding her — and a potent feeling of naivete for ever believing the image existed without them.

"What happened on that day really set me on a path (red and blue)" (2018), (without flash) (© Hank Willis Thomas, photo by the author for Hyperallergic)

"What happened on that day really set me on a path (red and blue)" (2018), (with flash) (© Hank Willis Thomas, photo by the author for Hyperallergic)

Cultural critic
Hanif

Abdurraqib once wrote, "Nina Simone opens her mouth and an entire history is built before us, where there is nowhere for anyone to hide from the truth as she has lived it." These words speak to Thomas's work, as it builds entire histories before us; they also highlight the risk of opening more space for the viewer. When we have more opportunity to interact with art on our own terms, there are more places to hide from its difficult truths, particularly viewers who have the privilege to do so.

In the simplest terms, anyone who doesn't illuminate the Retroflective images won't experience the details that complete them. But this concern became more complicated when I stood in a room with Unbranded: A Century of White Women, 1915–2015, a series in which Thomas removed the texts of advertisements targeted to white women. The selection of 14 photos included from the series of 100 largely focuses on "the persistent association of white femininity with motherhood and domesticity, fair-skinned beauty, rosy youthfulness, and sexual availability," as the text articulated. Yet, a darker, more nuanced tension boils beneath their surfaces — particularly when considered in tandem with another gallery featuring Thomas's Reflections in Black by Corporate America, 1968–2008, for which he applied the same treatment to ads targeting African Americans.

Situated in connected but separate galleries, I had the urge to bring the two series together. Speaking to the history behind them, Thomas said to me, "There was a parallel women's rights movement happening at the same time as the civil rights movement. They were not completely segregated but they definitely were not as in alignment as they could have been." I wanted to physically confront this relationship also fleetingly touched upon in a label for “Give your daughter a daughter” (1971/2015), an uncanny image of a white woman, young girl, and her doll smiling from a rattan throne chair — a cultural symbol associated with Black Panther Party leader Huey P. Newton. The label, written by Ella Ray, the Kress Interpretative Fellow for the exhibition, notes, “...the possession of this visual space at the peak of the Black Power movement marks white women’s role as disruptors of Black Liberation.”

Hank Willis Thomas: All Things Being Equal... installation view (image courtesy the Portland Art Museum)

Hank Willis Thomas: All Things Being Equal... installation view (image courtesy the Portland Art Museum)

This struck me as a particularly important moment of the exhibition for the majority-white city of Portland, when the more difficult, less discussed questions of white women’s roles as both oppressors and tools of oppression could be brought to the fore. Yet, with the exception of Ray’s label, this issue was largely left as a gap for viewers to bridge on their own. I would like to think that some people grabbed the microphone after I left that night, that some implicated themselves in making the deeper, harder connections. Those who did are certain to have left All Things Being Equal... taking to heart Thomas’s provocation: “The most revolutionary thing a person can do is be open to change.”

Hank Willis Thomas: All Things Being Equal... continues at the Portland Art Museum through January 12, 2020. The exhibition will travel to the Crystal Bridges Museum of American Art (February 8–April 20, 2020) and Cincinnati Art Museum (July 10–October 11, 2020).

MORE FROM HYPERALLERGIC

African American Cultural Center

"We Inspire Urban Generations!" (since 1958) 350 Masten Avenue Buffalo NY 14209 716.884.2013

African American Conceptual artist Hank Willis Thomas' Bold Black Beautiful Statements in Public Art

📅 November 18, 2019 👤 TheChallengerNews 💡 #publicart, blackartist

Hank Willis Thomas who works primarily with themes related to perspective, identity, commodity, media, and popular culture has remained constant in his effort for not only delivering meaningful and impactful messaging through his work but undoubtedly creating change in the public domain and within how we communicate and see ourselves in the world.

He has been exhibited throughout the United States and abroad in countless museums, art institutes among other accomplishments.

His latest public art projects include two indelible public installations, the most recent being UNITY, (2019) new powerful and permanent 22 foot tall bronze sculpture of an arm with the index finger pointing skyward that stands at the newly constructed intersection of Tillary and Adams Street in Brooklyn N.Y. near the exit from the Brooklyn bridge commissioned by New York City's Percent for Art program.

The artist also has a highly anticipated sculpture set to unveil on Boston Commons in Boston honoring Martin Luther King and Coretta Scott King . Thomas entitled it, The Embrace, a stunning 22 ft. tall sculpture that represents the hands of Martin Luther King and Coretta Scott King, evoking images of the couple—and other protesters—arm-in-arm in peaceful marches for civil rights as well as the power of physical togetherness in declaring resistance against injustice.

Some of his collaborative projects include Question Bridge: Black Males, an innovative transmedia art project that aims to facilitate a dialog between Black men from diverse and contending backgrounds and create a platform for representing and redefining Black male identity.

In Search Of The Truth (The Truth Booth)that did a 50 State Tour, and For Freedoms, an artist-run platform for civic engagement, discourse, and direct action for artists in the United State Thomas co-founded as well as other permanent public artwork unveiled "Love Over Rules" in San Francisco, CA and "All Power to All People" in Opa Locka, FL.

He lives in NYC with his newborn and wife curator Rujeko Hockley, one of the original organizers of traveling exhibition We Wanted A Revolution Black Radical Women that exhibited at Buffalo's Albright Knox Art Gallery in 2018. Thomas currently has his first comprehensive survey, Hank Willis Thomas: All Things Being Equal, open at the Portland Art Museum.

ART REVIEW

A Sculpture for Brooklyn's New Golden Age?

Hank Willis Thomas strives for “Unity” in his public artwork at the Brooklyn Bridge.

By Martha Schwendener

Nov. 10, 2019

Standing at the newly constructed intersection of Tillary and Adams Streets, near the exit from the Brooklyn Bridge, is a new, 22-foot bronze arm with the index finger pointing skyward. Commissioned by New York City's Percent for Art program, the permanent sculpture was created by Hank Willis Thomas and is titled “Unity” (2019). Is this outstretched arm a new greeting at the threshold of Brooklyn, like the Statue of Liberty in New York Harbor?

Giant arms and hands aren't a new thing in public sculpture. Head to Rome and you can see a giant right hand, originally from a 4th-century A.D. colossal sculpture of the Emperor Constantine. Paris has (finally) Jeff Koons's 41-foot hand holding a bouquet of tulips, his tribute to the victims of terrorist attacks. Visit Trafalgar Square in London, and you can gaze upon David Shrigley's “Really Good” (2016), a sculpture of a hand with the thumbs-up gesture — with the thumb grotesquely disproportionate to the hand, suggesting everything might not be supergood in Brexit-era London.

Mr. Thomas's “Unity” is more polite than Mr. Shrigley's sculpture. Muscular and appropriately proportioned, it suggests the arm of an athlete, echoing a smaller sculpture of an arm spinning a basketball on the tip of a finger that Mr. Thomas conceived in 2015. That work, called “Liberty,” inspired by a photograph of a Harlem Globetrotter and cast from the arm of one-time NBA All-Star Juwan Howard, is now in the Brooklyn Museum. Over the course of his career, Mr. Thomas has created other sculptures of hands and arms, with titles like “Promise” (2016).

Hank Willis Thomas Kyle Johnson for The New York Times

Sports and the black body have been in the center of Mr. Thomas's work since he began exhibiting photographs a decade and a half ago that showed shaved heads or chests branded with Nike logos. (He also created series of photographs in the vein of appropriation artists like Richard Prince, who rephotographed advertising imagery). Mr. Thomas, who studied photography at New York University and worked in commercial photography and television, brings to attention the way products are marketed to African-Americans, as well as the historical lack of representation of black people in the mass media.

Mr. Thomas's move into sculpture, though well-received, has been, to my mind, much less exciting. The sharpness and astuteness of his photography is often absent from three-dimensional objects, particularly the large-scale works that mimic sculptors like Claes Oldenburg and Coosje van Bruggen, who created outdoor installations based on everyday objects. Mr. Thomas takes this formula and overlays it with African-American motifs, like an Afro-comb stuck in the ground, titled “All Power to the People,” which has appeared in Philadelphia and at Burning Man.

The best project in recent years by Mr. Thomas — and one that strives for actual unity — is “For Freedoms,” founded in 2016 with Eric Gottesman as a “platform for civic engagement.” It produced collaborative exhibitions, installations, public programs, and billboard campaigns across the country. — Inspired by Norman Rockwell’s 1940s paintings of Franklin D. Roosevelt’s Four Freedoms (freedom of speech, freedom of worship, freedom from want, and freedom from fear), the billboards created through this project utilize Mr. Thomas’s photographic and advertising acumen in a smart, productive way. (Mr. Thomas lives in Brooklyn and is married to Rujeko Hockley, a co-curator of the last Whitney Biennial).

Politics has often been the point in public sculpture from ancient Rome to Mr. Oldenburg’s earliest public works, such as a phallic lipstick wheeled like a tank onto the campus of Yale University during the Vietnam War, to Mr. Shrigley’s absurd thumbs up.

“Unity,” 22 feet tall, being installed near the intersection of Adams Street and Tillary Street in Brooklyn. Kyle Johnson for The New York Times

“Unity” was originally called “We’re No. #1,” a more assertive title, perhaps recalling the historical competition between the boroughs that reaches back to the 19th century. “Unity” is a traditional and fairly conservative work, accompanied in the official news release by a statement that sounds politician-worthy: “This sculpture is a homage to, and celebration of, the unique and multifaceted character of the borough of Brooklyn,” Mr. Thomas says. “The spirit of Brooklyn has always been about upward mobility and connection to roots.”

Perhaps Mr. Thomas is saluting the new Brooklyn — the one of rising property values and more anodyne art. A raised fist, like the black power gesture at the 1968 Olympics that inspired and galvanized so many people, appears on the handle of Mr. Thomas’s comb sculpture, “All Power to the People.” That bold attitude feels more like the Brooklyn of yore.

Not having walked the Brooklyn Bridge in several years, I decided to cross on Saturday after seeing “Unity” installed. When I reached the Manhattan side there were vendors selling tchotchkes, including a sign that said, “No Stupid People Beyond This Point.” As a longtime resident of Brooklyn, I would be perfectly happy to have a 22-foot bronze sign with that message posted at the entrance to Brooklyn.

Make that a 100-foot sign.

WILLAMETTE WEEK

Hank Willis Thomas' "All Things Being Equal..." Cuts Deep Into the Psyche of our Society

The exhibit is currently up at Portland Art Museum, featuring over 90 works by the artist meant to awaken our awareness of how pop culture, advertising, and social dynamics shape our identities and scales for success.

By Lauren Yoshiko | Published November 6 at 3:36 PM | Updated November 7 at 3:40 PM

No two people experience an art exhibit the same. So much of our reactions are affected by nature, nurture, and whatever TV shows we watched in between. But if you live in America; if you watch professional sports or listen to hip hop anywhere in the world; if you've ever seen a commercial or heard a gunshot ring out in your city, Hank Willis Thomas' All Things Being Equal... will stick with you long after you leave the tranquil halls of the Portland Art Museum.

The exhibit features a collection of poignant pieces, including photographs, film, and sculptures, meant to awaken our awareness of how pop culture, advertising, and social dynamics shape our identities and scales for success. Thomas' work in this expansive exhibit is simple and direct, and the cunning bluntness is what makes it cut the deepest.

The conceptual artist is an East Coaster, born in New Jersey in 1976, and currently living and working in Brooklyn, NY. He has exhibited all over the world, screened films at Sundance, and created permanent installations in San Francisco, Miami, and the National Memorial for Peace and Justice in Montgomery, Alabama. All Things Being Equal... is the first major retrospective of Thomas' work, opening here in Portland and gracing only two other cities with the collection of over 90 works of photography, sculptures, quilted textiles, video, jewelry, found advertising memorabilia, and even a custom light-up liquor store sign emblazoned with "ABSOLUT POWER," showing the textbook sketch of slaves packed into the bowels of a ship within the vodka bottle's silhouette.

The exhibit is varied in the media and themes shown, with pieces that highlight different issues within popular culture, advertising, race, gun violence, and our relationship between past and present. These are all unified under Thomas' effort to challenge the visual systems that institute discrimination and inequality.

To illustrate these themes, Thomas often draws directly from personal experiences as a black man living in America. In All Things Being Equal... he repeatedly addresses the prominent subject of gun violence, stemming from the sudden loss of his own cousin when robbed at gunpoint. In PAM's two-story entrance hall, sixteen enormous blue banners covered in stitched stars resembling the American flag hang from the ceiling down to the floor—14,718 stars to be exact. Each represents a person shot and killed by someone else in the U.S. in 2018. In a photograph on the second floor titled Priceless #1, overlaid text like that old MasterCard commercial reads: "new socks: $1," "gold chain: $400," "9mm pistol: $80," "one bullet: $.60." "Picking the perfect casket for your son: Priceless." The image is a photograph taken by Thomas at his cousin's funeral.

It's powerful photographs like these that strike you the most throughout the exhibit. In the large, vertically aligned photograph titled Strange Fruit (2011), a shirtless black man in Nike basketball shorts and shoes seemingly hangs from one arm, positioned up as if to shoot a basket. A noose sits around his wrist as though the ball is a human's head, while his own head faces away from the camera, drooping down in a chillingly lifeless fashion. With the lighting and the angle, the ball looks more lively than the body, as if to remind the viewer that in the eyes of pop culture, the ball matters more than the replaceable black body to which it is attached.

The Cotton Bowl (also from the Strange Fruit series, 2011) features two black men crouched opposite each other at a yard line of a football field, one a football player in cleats and pads, his face obscured by the helmet, the other a cotton picker of times past, a straw hat obscuring his face as well. They mirror each other's stance, presenting the modern football field and cotton field as different reflections of the same playing field, creating a sort of déjà vu effect that forces one to think about what concepts like freedom, work, success, and choice mean on both sides of that yard line.

Across the photographs, regardless of whether depicting visuals from past or present, everything is hyperreal and clear, blurring those lines of "now" vs. "back in the day" with HD focus. It gives every image more power, eliminating the way the sepia-toned, fuzzy look of aged visuals helps us separate ourselves from the past even as it still very much affects modern lives.

You don't have to be an art history buff to appreciate the emotion in Thomas' take on Guernica, inspired by Picasso's famous painting of the same name. Instead of an oil painting, Thomas' Guernica is a collage-styled quilt made of different professional basketball jerseys cut up and sewn together to replicate the distorted shapes of humans and animals in anguish depicting the overwhelming, chaotic suffering of war. It puts the famous colors of the Lakers and Knicks and hallowed names like Durant and Bryant in a light that questions ideals of success, sacrifice, aggression, and state of mind.

Thomas' simple delivery of layered, provocative questions is perhaps best demonstrated in the series of Lumisty film pieces towards the end of the exhibit. Three words in enormous, all-caps font alternately read "HISTORY IS PAST" / "HISTORY IS PRESENT." In another, the message alternates between "WHITE IMITATES BLACK" and "BLACK IMITATES WHITE." With these simple yet stark words, in plain black font and white background (and vice versa, depending on where you stand in the room and, conceptually, where you stand philosophically), Thomas captures the essence of sprawling debates around dozens of issues that surround race relations, social dynamics, cultural shifts and the progression of time.

Somehow Thomas does pirouettes on the fine, high-wire line between polarizing specificity and digestible commentary on complex, personal and emotional themes. He has an uncanny ability to make deeply poignant commentary stated so plainly, clearly and directly conveying rich and nuanced ideas in a manner that everyone can understand. At All Things Being Equal..., Thomas challenges us to self-reflect about society and images we consume en masse in a most inclusive and expansive form—not to mention in our own backyard at Portland Art Museum. Don't miss this show.

All Things Being Equal... is up now until Jan. 12, 2020 at Portland Art Museum. There are a series of events surrounding the exhibit, including film screenings, workshops, and talks. Go to portlandartmuseum.org/exhibitions/hank-willis-thomas/ to learn more.

THE ART NEWSPAPER

‘Public art is propaganda, frankly’: Hank Willis Thomas discusses gun violence and the urgent need for alternative memorials

A host of the artist’s exhibitions and public projects open in various locations across the US open this year

CHARMAINE PICARD

31st October 2019 10:27 GMT

Hank Willis Thomas © Andrea Blanch

Hank Willis Thomas is making some of the most urgent, timely art in the US. With a knack for adopting popular icons and signs, whether in the form of sporting imagery or memorable photographs of historic events, he takes on key issues, including racial injustice and gun violence, and the historic events underpinning them, like colonialism and slavery, as exemplified in his photographic series Strange Fruit (2011). His work assumes numerous forms - from photographs and video to public sculpture - and the breadth of his work is reflected in his first-ever museum survey, which has just opened at the Portland Art Museum in Oregon. Meanwhile, he has an array of public projects being unveiled this year—on the High Line in New York and at the foot of the Brooklyn Bridge—and next, in Boston and Seattle.

The Art Newspaper: Mass shootings in US cities like Gilroy, El Paso and Dayton are on the rise. Can you talk about your commissioned work on gun violence at the Portland Art Museum?

Hank Willis Thomas: There are beautiful memorials to presidents and to victims and fallen soldiers of foreign wars on the Washington Mall. Here in New York, we have World War I and World War II memorials, and we have yet to have a memorial for the American soldiers and civilians who died in the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, where we lost nearly 10,000 American soldiers in the past 20 years. During that same time, more than 200,000 people have been shot and killed in this country. And there is no discussion about how to memorialise the lives of American citizens who fall victim to weapons of war at home.

Since my cousin, Songha Willis Thomas, was murdered as a victim of gun violence in 2000, I've been asking myself: "How do you measure life? How do you memorialise life?" The Portland commission is a flag-based work, where each of the 14,719 five-pointed stars commemorates a person who died from gun violence in 2018. These stars represent our American mythology and iconography.

The number of fatalities from military weaponry in the US is staggering. How can you bring increased awareness and humanise the problem?

MASS Design Group and I have been thinking about how you conceptualise and build a national movement to honour the victims of gun violence. I worked with the design group on Brian Stevenson's Equal Justice Initiative, and the National Memorial for Peace and Justice in Alabama. Brian's call to action is: "This is an American tragedy, and a very integral part of American history, and we need to have a place to come to terms with it." So we're building on that idea, and we're piloting a potential national memorial. We're working with the organisation, Everytown for Gun Safety, which has been collecting objects from family members of those who've been shot and killed. The objects are put into glass bricks that have been used to make four glasshouses. The installation is travelling to the National Building Museum in Washington, DC in 2020.

The Cotton Bowl, from the series Strange Fruit (2011) Courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery

The Gordon Parks Foundation awarded you a 2018 fellowship that supports artists working with themes of social justice and representation. What images from the foundation’s archives are you working with?

I grew up at the Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture in Harlem, where my mother was the curator of photography, and also at the Smithsonian’s National American Museum Project, and I interned at the National Museum of American History twice when I was in high school. The legacy of Gordon Parks is everywhere. Gordon Parks stands out because he was an outlier for a generation of African Americans. He was able to build a career in Chicago as a fashion photographer and travel the world for Life magazine, and be employed by the US government with the Works Progress Administration, but also to be the first African American to direct a major Hollywood film.

The film, Shaft?

He directed Shaft in 1971, but I’m looking at his 1969 film, The Learning Tree, based on a book that he wrote about his life as a young black man living in Fort Scott, Kansas. Through my research, I learned that the first Great Migration of African Americans from the south following the Civil War was not to the north but to the west. They migrated to places like Kansas and Nebraska and Oklahoma. I’m weaving some of the film-set photography together with images of migrants who travelled during the 1879 Exodus and were known as Exodusters. Did you have a relationship with Gordon Parks?

My dad had a relationship with his son, Gordon Parks Jr, who directed the film Superfly. He was generous with his time to young people like my mother, who was making her way in the field of photography which, as you know, wasn’t seen as an art form. If it weren’t for people like Gordon who broke the mould, it wouldn’t be possible for people like my mother to break the mould, and people like me to ride the wave.

Your Punctum sculptures are powerful reminders of radical acts of rebellion. Where did you find the source material for Resistance (Leopard Man Punctum) (2019)?

Colonial Africans suffered rape, abuse, murder and pillaging, and in reaction secret societies were formed as a type of rebellion. I like to call them African Ninjas because they would sometimes do what we would think of as horrible things, assassinate people and intimidate people, but they also worked to disrupt the incredible oppressive force of colonialism. Most of what we know is inspired by an article in Popular Science magazine in 1943.

The sculpture is based on a rendering of a famous work in Belgium of a leopard man preying on a person who's a colonial collaborator. In a later movie, Tarzan and the Leopard Woman (1946), the actors are clearly Europeans. Most of our interpretations of African popular culture are filtered through European mythology about Africans, and it has nothing to do with Africans at all.

You've mentioned that the claws may have been an inspiration for Wolverine and other superheroes.

You can't help but think there was some influence since these movies were being made, and these books were being written between 1916 and the 1940s. Jack Kirby and Stan Lee were kids at that time and were reading fantasy novels. Is it possible that Black Panther or Wolverine may have been inspired by the books they read and the movies they saw as children? It's impossible to believe that those ideas were not there. If it's all mythology, like most of what we know about Africa is, then why can't we embrace it and start to tell different stories?

What alternative stories would you like to tell?

Most of the beauty of the Black experience in America is the incredible joy and vibrancy that lives in the spirit and the soul, in spite of all that's been done to crush it. I think my mom's work, where she's been looking at photographs taken by African Americans since the dawn of photography, shows the other side to the story rather than the story that was put out there.

You've used the field of sports to highlight Black excellence. Joel Embiid, an NBA player from Cameroon, modelled for Unity (2019), a monumental sculpture to be installed later this year at the foot of the Brooklyn Bridge. Would you say there is a link between sports and politics?

People sometimes say sports are not political, but if you really think about it, sport is a global industry that intersects with everything from mining to farming to development to urban planning to college and universities, to legal policies around health. What would America be if it weren't for Jim Thorpe, a Native American Olympian who helped put the American spirit on the map on a national stage? Or Jesse Owens or Wilma Rudolph or Billie Jean King? If you're not going to allow me to excel in school and in business, and I can play this game, I'm going to play it better than anybody else, and I'm going to try harder than anybody else.

Public sculptures like Unity (2019) and The Embrace, a commission for the Boston Commons honouring Coretta Scott King and Martin Luther King Jr, offer positive, uplifting messages. How do you want to activate the public space with these works?

I think public art is propaganda, frankly. Most of the public art we grew up around was white men on horses looking down on us. The question of the day is, how do we imagine new public art? A new way of championing the spirit of people who we find inspiration from - athletes, activists, yes sometimes maybe soldiers. But we have so many memorials for war and so few for peace. That can't be by accident, and it's not sustainable for our psyche.

Do artists have a role to play as civic leaders by engaging a broader public?

I see art, history and politics in everything. For me, artists are civic leaders. It also depends on who you call an artist. My grandmother was a beautician. That's an art form. Cooking is an art form. I try to encourage people who don't see themselves as artists to think creatively. Projects like the Truth Booth, Question Bridge and For Freedoms [see key works box] invite members of the public who don't see themselves as artists to collaborate in the creative process.

Biography

Born: 1976, Plainfield, New Jersey

Training: MFA Photography/MA Visual Criticism, California College of the Arts, 2004; BFA Photography and Africana Studies, New York University, 1998

Selected prizes: Gordon Parks Foundations Fellowship, 2018; Guggenheim Fellowship, 2018;

Key shows: Black Survival Guide or How to Live Through a Police Riot, Delaware Art Museum, 2018; Blind Memory and Freedom Isn't Always Beautiful, SCAD Museum of Art, Savannah, Georgia, 2017; Strange Fruit, Corcoran Gallery of Art, Washington, 2011

Represented by: Jack Shainman Gallery, New York; Kayne Griffin Corcoran, Los Angeles; Ben Brown Fine Arts, London and Hong Kong

Raise Up (2014) Courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery

Key works

Raise Up (2014)

The monumental bronze and cement sculpture is based on a photograph by Ernest Cole of 13 South African miners as they undergo a humiliating group medical examination in the nude. The piece is permanently installed on the grounds of the National Memorial for Peace and Justice in Montgomery, Alabama, a site dedicated to the legacy of slavery and mass incarceration. It stands as a reminder of police brutality and racial bias in the US criminal justice system.

Four Freedoms (2018)

Inspired by Norman Rockwell's 1943 series of paintings representing an idealised version of American life, Thomas, together with the photographer Emily Shur, updated the imagery with a more representative picture of American diversity. Rockwell's paintings were based on President Franklin D. Roosevelt's wartime speech outlining four essential rights: freedom of speech, freedom of worship, freedom from want and freedom from fear. The works are part of a larger artist-run platform called For Freedoms, launched by Thomas and Eric Gottesman in 2016, that promotes civic engagement through Town Hall meetings, exhibitions, billboard campaigns and artist residencies.

I Am a Man (2009)

This 20-panel work is based on Civil Rights-era protest signs. Each painting offers a variation, such as, "I Am 3/5 Man", "You The Man," and, in the final canvas, "I Am. Amen"—a declarative statement of power and agency. According to Thomas: "I was amazed that just eight years before I was born, it was necessary for people to hold up signs affirming their humanity."

• Hank Willis Thomas: All Things Being Equal... ↗, Portland Art Museum, Portland, Oregon, until 12 January 2020, touring to Crystal Bridges Museum of American Art, Bentonville, Arkansas, 8 February-20 April 2020, and the Cincinnati Art Museum in Cincinnati, Ohio, 10 July-11 October 2020; Exodusters ↗, Gordon Parks Foundation, Pleasantville, New York, until 31 January 2020; The Gun Violence Memorial Project with MASS Design Group, Chicago Architecture Biennial, Chicago, until 5 January 2020; The Writing on the Wall, in collaboration with Dr Baz Dreisinger and MASS Design Group, High Line Art, New York, 31 October-10 November; Unity, a public art commission for Percent for Art, Brooklyn, NY, opens this autumn, date to be confirmed

FOR FREEDOMS CO-FOUNDERS TALK REMIXING ROCKWELL — AND THOSE POLITICAL BILLBOARDS

FOR FREEDOMS CO-FOUNDERS TALK REMIXING ROCKWELL — AND THOSE POLITICAL BILLBOARDS

OCTOBER 31, 2019 | GILLIAN EDEVANE
POSTED IN VISUAL

OCTOBER 31, 2019 | GILLIAN EDEVANE
POSTED IN VISUAL

Hank Willis Thomas (L), Eric Gottesman (M) and Maria Brito (R) discuss For Freedoms in the Oct. 30 episode of "The C-Files with Maria Brito."

When longtime friends Hank Willis Thomas and Eric Gottesman set out to create a political action committee in 2016, they knew they wanted their organization to live at the intersection of art, politics and public participation.

"We think that art is always politics, and all art is political," Gottesman said in a recent episode of "The C-Files with Maria Brito." "And public policy is a reflection of our culture, which art creates. So we wanted to expand what it meant for people to be politically engaged and civically engaged."

The duo began looking at past examples of art that revolved around those themes, finding their first jolt of inspiration in Norman Rockwell's "Four Freedoms." First published as a rallying cry for the war effort following Franklin D. Roosevelt's State of the Union Address in 1941, the series depicted Americans — or rather, a mostly-white cohort of Americans — exercising four fundamental human rights: freedom of speech, freedom of worship, freedom from want and freedom from fear.

Norman Rockwell's original "Freedom to Worship" illustration, first published in the Saturday Evening Post in 1943.

After looking at the 80-year old portraits, it was clear to Gottesman and Thomas that Rockwell's interpretation left out a huge swath of Americans.

"Not only were the freedoms limited to four, but also the definition of who was entitled to those freedoms as Americans was pretty limited," Gottesman explained. "... So we were interested in blowing out that idea of who is included, and who is considered to be leading our society."

The result was the creation of "For Freedoms," which the two describe as a platform for creating civic engagement through the arts. In an homage to Rockwell's series, the PAC's first major project was reinterpreting his illustrations to reflect the varied demographics of the people who have long-called this country home.

"We wound up doing 82 versions of Rockwell's 'Four Freedoms' images," Thomas said. "I think you'd be hard-pressed to not find representatives of people you consider to be part of your community."

Hank Willis Thomas and Emily Shur's updated version of the Norman Rockwell classic, created for For Freedoms.

The success of their Rockwell adaptation has since led to a series of other projects, the most large-scale of which launched in 2018 under the title “The 50 State Initiative.” As part of the art activation, For Freedoms and the scores of artists who work with the PAC designed a series of vague, yet nonetheless arresting, billboard ads.

One erected in New York City, designed by Thomas, states “LoveOverRules” in white lettering against a glossy, brick-red background. Another simply asserts “WE ARE THE ASTEROID” in bold font that resembles the cautionary signs that border construction zones. The idea, according to Thomas, was to use public space in a way that would challenge the status quo or provoke thought about deeper societal issues.

“We are in an age where branding trumps everything,” Thomas said. “What’s really interesting about art is that it asks questions that are often unsettling. So, what would it mean to put billboards across the country that didn’t necessarily sell anything, other than an idea that we wanted to put out into the world?”

The answer, it turns out, was engagement. Since its inception, the “50 State Initiative” has maintained a presence in all U.S. states and Puerto Rico and Washington D.C., spreading into a series of town hall events and other opportunities for public discussion.

Watch the video below to hear the co-founders explain the project in more detail and find out about their plans for the future.

On View

Hank Willis Thomas's New Portland Art Museum Show Exposes the Manipulative Power of Advertising in the City Where Nike Was Born

The artist hopes that Nike advertising executives will make time to visit the exhibition.

Rachel Corbett, October 28, 2019

Hank Willis Thomas at his survey at the Portland Art Museum. Courtesy of the Portland Art Museum.

For the artist Hank Willis Thomas, one of the highlights of having his mid-career survey at the Portland Art Museum is that it's in the same city as the headquarters of Nike.

Thomas has long been influenced, and seemingly troubled, by the effects of the company's branding, elements of which appear throughout his work. In fact, the show's promotional banner hanging from the Oregon museum's facade features Thomas's 2003 photograph of a black man's head, branded with the Nike swoosh logo.

Years before Colin Kaepernick took a knee and ignited the sports industry's intensely politicized new era, Thomas was making work about the plight of college athletes like his cousin Songha Willis, one of the many young men who "spend their whole life trying to get this opportunity, and then there could be an injury, or a life-altering decision about where to go, and the school and everyone's making money but the players," Thomas told artnet News.

Hank Willis Thomas's Branded Head (2003) at the Portland Art Museum.

The sports industry's exploitation of African American labor is a dynamic that recurs throughout the exhibition. Thomas compares it explicitly to slavery in photographs like those of a sneaker chained to a basketball, or a football player crouching across a yard line from a cotton picker, or a player dunking a basketball into a noose.

Despite the apparent condemnation in much of Thomas's sports-influenced work, the artist considers himself a fan of Nike's ads, which are created largely by the Portland-based agency Weiden and Kennedy. "I got to tour their offices and the Nike offices," he said. "It was really cool."

Thomas admires the potency of advertising, if not always its ends. "I grew up in what they call the 'MTV Generation,' and I realized then that advertising is a completely powerful language, but it's usually a one-way language," he said. Companies use it "only to get us to buy something, but there's not as much use of that language to talk about other issues."

Hank Willis Thomas, The Cotton Bowl (2011). Image courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York.
© Hank Willis Thomas.

Thomas decided he wanted to use this form of messaging to “sell ideas, rather than just be driven by product.” In 2016, he and fellow artist Eric Gottesman formed the For Freedoms Super PAC. But instead of raising money for a political candidate, they generated artist-designed advertising, such as billboards by Marilyn Minter, Rashid Johnson, and others that appeared in all 50 US states during the midterm elections of 2018.

For Freedoms is currently in the process of transitioning from a political action committee to a nonprofit, but it will still be active during the 2020 elections. Its plans are yet to be determined, but Thomas said that “we want to do a different version of the 50-state initiative in 2020. Hopefully it’ll include billboards.”

The Thomas survey in Portland will travel to the Crystal Bridges Museum of American Art in Arkansas and the Cincinnati Art Museum in Ohio. But before it does, Thomas hopes that some of the Portland area’s advertisers will be able to pay a visit.

Hank Willis Thomas’s Guernica (2016) is made from cut-up and restitched sports jerseys. Courtesy of the Portland Art Museum.

“Being that my work is so influenced by Nike and Apple advertising, and Weiden and Kennedy—the company that kind of opened all those doors in all our minds, setting the gold standard—it’s exciting that people from those companies will be influenced by my work,” he said.

He pointed to a print in the show that features, in lenticular optical-illusion text, the phrase “ART IMITATES LIFE IMITATES ADS IMITATES ART” and said, “it’s a vicious cycle of art directors and graphic designers coming to museums to be inspired by art and then filtering that into the ads that they make and filtering [those] into the world to imitate.”

“Hank Willis Thomas: All Things Being Equal...” is on view through January 12, 2020, at the Portland Art Museum.

Portland Art Museum's Hank Willis Thomas Retrospective Invokes Black Joy: The Strongest Force In the Universe

by Cameron Hawkey

"Crossroads," 2012. Chromogenic print, plexiglas, and Lumisty film © HANK WILLIS THOMAS

During a boozy opening night dialogue with Danielle McCoy and Ragen Fykes of Wieden+Kennedy, and assistant professor Dr. Derrais Carter from the Pacific Northwest College of Art, Carter asked conceptual artist Hank Willis Thomas how he got someone to give themselves a Nike scar for his photograph "Branded Head." Thomas replied, "Uh, this is Photoshop."

It was surprising to hear someone take Thomas' photo as truth, but also appropriate, as a major theme in his work deals with the "truth" of photography. In a brief conversation I had with Thomas about the retrospective, he stressed, "Truth is the most potent battleground there is."

Thomas' early work focused on the production of fictional corporate products; more significantly, he used corporate advertising and careful redaction of logos and brands' to examine what the ads were really selling. Eventually going beyond advertising, Thomas explored all manner of images, isolating singular gestures and remaking them in sculptures of fingertips grazing basketballs and passports turning to ash. These works and more are all part of All Things Being Equal..., the Portland Arts Museum's new retrospective of Thomas's work, which brings together old and new pieces of incredible variety—including Christopher Columbus' credit card, gold chains, button pins bigger than stop signs, and an enormous scrap quilt of Picasso's "Guernica" made from sports jerseys.

"Guernica," 2016. Mixed media, including sport jerseys, 131 × 281 inches. © HANK WILLIS THOMAS

The contrast of pointed shallowness and hidden depth in Thomas' work is stunning. The height of these extremes comes in "Winter in America," a harrowing stop-motion video reenacting the 2000 murder of Thomas' cousin, Songha Willis, with G.I. Joe action figures.

The show makes for an intense experience that could spark any amount of brainy critique. But instead of curatorial insights, the descriptions accompanying the artworks are usually quips from students at Martin Luther King Elementary. I found the children's reactions as profound as any art critic's.

This is the first survey of Thomas' work and the biggest PAM show in years. And they know it. There are loads of events attached, but I'm particularly excited to check out the Numberz on Thursday, November 7, where DJ Ambush will curate a DJ set soundtrack within the exhibition and as a live broadcast on 96.7 FM. Also worth noting are films selected by Thomas, which will be shown throughout the exhibition's run. John Carpenter's They Live already screened, but next up is James Baldwin: The Price of the Ticket (Oct 27, 2 pm, Northwest Film Center Whitsell Auditorium). On Saturday, December 14, there's free museum admission and you can catch the PBS documentary Malcolm X: Make It Plain.

Quite plainly, this show rocks. It's tragic, intense, sincere, and slick, with surprising and unforgettable fusions of feelings and ideas. That the show has so much heart reflects Thomas' extraordinary intention, which he seemed to comment on at the end of the opening night discussion. "There is no stronger power in the universe than Black joy," he said. "Because it has been tested and never been destroyed."

ONE ON ONE: ADGER COWANS AND HANK WILLIS THOMAS

10.24.2019

ADGER COWAN OUTSIDE OF THE ODEON,
2019. PORTRAIT BY NONA FAUSTINE.

Adger Cowans has lived and made photographic history for more than 50 years, starting with his job as an assistant to Gordon Parks when he first arrived in New York in 1958. With a new book out and works on view in “Soul of Nation,” which heads to San Francisco’s de Young Museum this fall, the polymathic artist is among the forces who opened doors for the next generation, including Hank Willis Thomas, who is now leading the pack of today’s imagemakers. Willis Thomas took time out of preparing for “All Things Being Equal,” his solo show on view at the Portland Art Museum, to talk with Cowans about his life and work.

Hank Willis Thomas: I've always wondered how it felt as you were making your long and broad career. Did it feel like you were making history?

Adger Cowans: No, not in the beginning. There were no history books on photography in the '50s, so photography wasn't really considered an art. For me, the glory was being a photographer, like Eugene Smith, Henri Cartier-Bresson, Robert Capa, guys like that. They were sort of my heroes. Of course, I really liked the prints of Edward Weston and Ansel Adams. That was kind of the seed of what they called fine art.

HWT: Growing up in Ohio, how did you come into contact with Edward Weston?

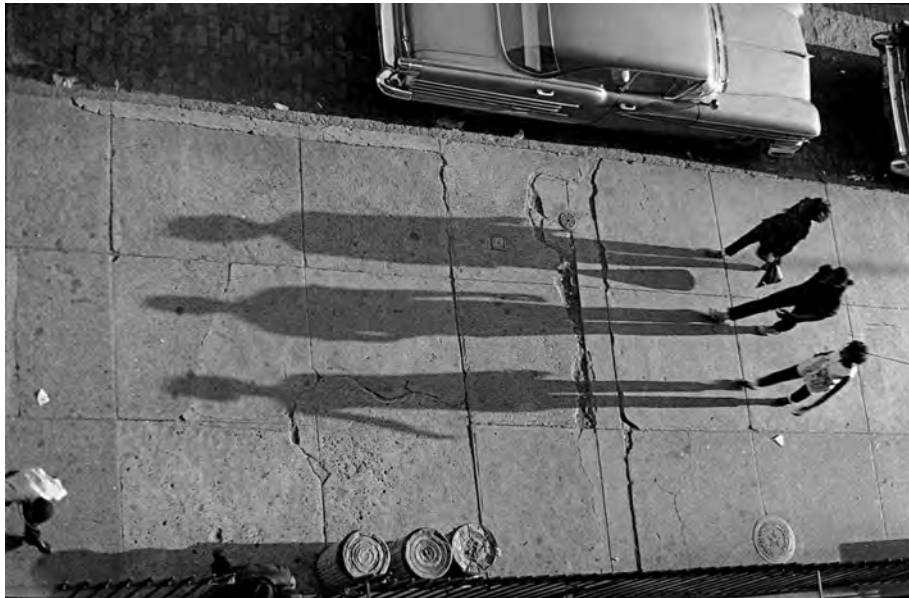

AC: My teacher at Ohio University, Clarence H. White, was the son of Clarence H. White senior, who was an important photographer and knew Group f/64 with Ansel Adams and Edward Weston. I got to see actual prints by them because they were in his collection. When I came to New York in 1958 I worked with Gordon [Parks]. Nobody was talking about photography as art. Journalism was the route—to be a photojournalist—and Magnum was the big company for that. If you did anything else, they called it artsy-fartsy.

HWT: When did you start showing your work?

AC: I had my first one-man show at the Heliography Gallery in 1962. The Heliography Gallery included photographers like Paul Caponigro, Carl Chiarenza, Walter Chappell, Marie Cosindas, Scott Hyde and W. Eugene Smith. They were not commercial photographers; they were photographers who thought of photography as art. I related to that because at university, my teachers were concerned about your input in the photograph, as opposed to just taking a picture of something. So I had some foundation for a philosophy of personal expression.

HWT: That seems like an exciting time to be in New York, especially as a young creative person.

AC: We had big fights with the art guys, the painters, because they were saying that photography wasn't art, it was craft. Photographers and painters and sculptors would get together and have these big discussions about whether photography was art or not. I think photography finally officially became art when Ansel Adams sold his picture Moonrise Over Hernandez for $1,500 and they put a photo of him on the cover of Time magazine. People thought it was crazy! Nobody had ever paid that much money for a photo.

ADGER COWANS'S 3 SHADOWS SHOT IN THE BRONX IN THE 1960S.

HWT: I saw that photograph in someone's house recently, an original print, and no one who was born in the past 25–30 years can really understand how incredible a feat it was to not only make that picture, but to make that print the way Ansel Adams did. Now there isn't the same stigma around the idea of photography as craft as there was earlier, but now the craft is lost—especially the dark room because of digital photography. How do you feel about that, having done so much in silver and then seeing how this medium has changed so dramatically, from black and white to color to digital to now seeing most of our images on screens?

AC: For me, it's always about the image, no matter what you're using. Whether you're using film, digital, print-making, it's all about the emotion in the photograph or painting or whatever. Capturing those feelings that come through you—if you're honest and true, it translates so that other people can feel them. It's not so much the technique as how much emotion you get into it. I think digital is great. I'm able to take old negatives and really make them come alive. I'm for all of it, I'm not against any of it.

HWT: When you arrived in New York, there was the Beat movement happening in the Village, jazz was in its golden age and the Civil Rights movement was starting to catch a lot of national attention. Was that all when you were—

AC:

I was in the middle of all of it, but for me, it was always about moving the art forward more than it was about racial consciousness, though I was one of the founding members of Kamoinge and I was also in AfriCOBRA and we really stressed the possibility of arts for our people and showing them in a positive light. I was concerned most about the art. I got out of advertising and photojournalism in 1968 and I went to Brazil. And when I came back from Brazil, everything changed in how I approached my work.

HWT: What was happening in Brazil?

HWT: What was happening in Brazil?

AC:

AC: Well, nothing! [Laughter.] I just wanted to get away from advertising. I had a studio and an agent and everything, but I was tired of doing ads for toothpaste, or the army, Con Edison, all those kinds of things. The commercial world was unapologetically white; there were only a couple of black guys working on that level back then. HWT: You don't hear so many stories of African- American artists who were like, I'm tired of doing these big jobs so I decided to go to Brazil. You hear of artists going to Europe, Paris—but you went to Brazil. What was that like? That was also a great moment in music and culture in Brazil. AC: It was fantastic. It opened up a whole thing for me because of the Afro-Brazilian thing. I lived in Bahia. I had originally gone there to do a job for Esquire, and the guy who was my contact said he was only going to give me part of the money because he wasn't going back to America. After I was there for a while and saw how beautiful Brazil was, I decided I wasn't going back to the States either!

HWT: So you were on your own journey then? AC: Yeah, I got there and after I met all of these different people, I felt comfortable and ended up staying almost a year. I wasn't ready to come back but I had to. I had my work, business and everything. I came back to New York, and for two or three weeks I was just depressed!

HWT: What made it so special for you?

AC: I just felt all the different colors of the different people—the Indian with the African and the African with the Italian and the Brazilian—it was just a beautiful culture. I felt a blend of love among the people. I was living on Afonso Celso Street, which is a black part of Bahia, and there wasn't all that racial tension. It was there, but it wasn't as overt as it is now. I felt at home. I met Caetano Veloso and Gilberto Gil, all of those guys. They were young kids at that time and they came to our house because we were American— me and my friend Roz Allen—and they wanted to know about America and what was going on with the Black Arts Movement. At first they thought I was Stokely Carmichael. I ended up going on television and talking about what was going on in America, but I was trying to escape all of that stuff; I didn't want to be bothered. I did go down south after Medgar Evers was killed. The NY Herald Tribune had a grant for artists, so I got a grant to go down there and photograph what was going on, but I wasn't so much concerned about trying to document. I was more about the things that were happening internally with me.

HWT: I'm fascinated by the breadth of your work—there's your political work and commercial work, like photographs of people like Mick Jagger, Jane Fonda, Katharine Hepburn. Was there anything you did not want to do? Very few people have such a broad legacy.

AC: I didn't want to work commercially, and I didn't want to work for assistants and worked with a lot of the important photographers in New York at the time, including Lillian Bassman, Gordon Parks and others. Gordon said to me: you don't want to work at Life magazine because you already have a point of view and a style, and if you work at Life magazine, they'll kill that. I also went to Ebony magazine and met Moneta Sleet Jr. He was a really nice guy and he said, you don't want to work at Ebony. I said, I need a job! And he said, you have your own style already; if you work at Ebony they'll kill you like a work horse, 'shoot this, shoot that.' That kind of took me out of the magazine business.

HWT: And that's why your book is called Personal Vision.

AC: It's called that because it's my vision, what I feel and think about images and photography, painting, the whole thing. I realized that was really the way I was trained, even though I was in school with journalists like Paul Fusco and James Coralis. We were in class together at Ohio University where we had a class of about 10,000 students and out of all of those students there were only 22 black students, so we all knew what we were doing and kind of hung out together because Ohio was still racist at that time. We couldn't get haircuts in the town, so we started cutting each other's hair, and there were places we couldn't go because we were black. We started integrating places and being very revolutionary, and they called the National Guard at one point because we started real trouble by sticking in the barber shop and not moving and going into places where we would have to go around back to be served—so we would go around back and get our beer or whatever and then we'd go in the front door and sit down. Of course, they went crazy and called the police. All of this wasn't necessarily making the news, but we were really angry about the way things were going. It had nothing to do with taking pictures, nothing to do with art, just the fact that we were black students. A lot of these kids that I went to school with came from good black families. They didn't grow up in the hood; these were the kids whose parents were educated, whose parents were doctors and lawyers. It wasn't about being ashamed of being black—we were proud to be black. This was before the Black Arts Movement. I had a black family with a lot of love—Thanksgiving, Christmas, there was 20 people at the table, aunts, uncles, cousins, everybody. I experienced a lot of love growing up, so I knew who I was.

FAYE DUNAWAY IN 1970 FOR THE MOVIE PUZZLE OF A DOWNFALL CHILD.

HWT: Did you know that you were part of a historical moment? That you were living through and making history? All the names that you were interacting with and the things that you were doing are things people read about now.

AC: No, I didn't think about it that way. Not until much later. I was probably 50 years old before I realized that the things I had done and the things I had lived through were a part of history. I was just concerned about being a photographer. I didn't care about the other stuff. I didn't want to take any time away from the work I wanted to do. I loved taking pictures from the time I was 15 years old. I never thought of it as a job, or an art, or anything. It was just something that I really loved to do.

HWT: What would you say to a younger version of yourself—if you were able to say to yourself at 18 years old that you'd be an internationally renowned artist who traveled the world and shot films and ad campaigns.

AC: When I was 18, I wouldn't have believed that I would have the career that I've had. I've been working on my website now and my agent is putting things together and she called me and said, "Jesus Christ, you lived two lifetimes already!" I've never really thought about it, which is to a fault in some degree, because there's a lot of stuff I didn't write down. For me, it was about living my life, not a life that was prescribed to me by the government or whatever. I thought my life was important because the connections I had with my spirit let me know that I had something to do.

HWT: You were part of Kamoinge and AfriCOBRA, which are very community-oriented movements. It took 40 or 50 years for people to catch up to what you guys were imagining then. Photography wasn't even seen as an art form when you were starting — much less was there a space to be a black artist photographer. You have an ability to see beyond what the world thinks you can and should be, and that's part of what you talk about in terms of being on this spiritual quest of self-expansion and exploration, but you've also stayed rooted to the African- American community, and the international African diaspora community as well.

AC: I look at it like this: I was born black and then I became an artist. A black man living, born and raised in America, and that's enough. I don't have to say that I'm doing pictures of black people, or that I'm socially involved—I'm a black man. Whatever is going on, I'm involved. I can't not be involved. I don't have to make a point of it. I'm proud, I'm black, I grew up that way. I don't have to go on talking about it and screaming about it. With Kamoinge, I didn't want to use that name, because it was a label. I like the name we first had, which was Camera 35. I liked that name because it dealt with photography, and that's what I wanted to stay with, so I fought everybody. [Laughter.] Ray Francis and I were the only ones who went against it.

HWT: I knew all of you through my mother [Deborah Willis] and her work at the Schomburg Center. The only photographers I knew growing up were the black photographers: Moneta Sleet Jr., Gordon Parks, James Van Der Zee, you and Roy DeCarava. When I went to college, I learned about W. Eugene Smith, and maybe I knew a little bit about Ansel Adams beforehand. I actually had an almost reverse education about photographic history. I really feel privileged to be able to witness the broadening awareness of our society, of the work that people have been doing for more than half a century, and I'm really grateful because I don't think my mother would have had the audacity to do a lot of the work she did if it weren't for you all. So many of us are in the legacy of Gordon Parks, just by him going places he wasn't supposed to and refusing to be marginalized.

AC: All of that is true. And Deb's history book was huge—nothing like that existed before. Nothing. You had a really good grounding before you went to college. You already had it going on before you found out about all of these other guys.

HWT: You've always had this signature smooth look—the scarf and the hat. [Laughter.] Is that intentional?

AC: It's energy. You ever meet somebody for the first time and you shake their hand and they give you that limp hand and you go, ugh, and just don't get a good vibe? And then you meet somebody else, and it's a great vibe, and you get along right away? That's the energy that's coming from that first person and coming from you, and it's invisible to the naked eye, but it's a very real energy. One of the things that kept me in photography was the fact that I could take a picture and show it to somebody and they would talk about whether they liked it or whether they didn't, and to me, what they said about the work was a window into who they were. If I went to a top magazine to show my work, and usually they were white people, whatever they said about my work, I listened because it told me who they were.

HWT: At 83 years old, you seem as passionate about making images and doing work as—

AC: Oh, yes! Look, I had Romare Bearden, I had Jacob Lawrence, I had Norman Lewis, I had all these guys around me. All these guys worked right up until the end. They did not slack off. These were my heroes. When I came to New York, I met these guys and they were the people to know, to be friendly with, to find out about. They were carrying on something, but hardly anyone was paying attention. I had a show at the Kenkeleba House Gallery, and it was great. I felt so good to be there. I felt that I had arrived. I didn't care about what uptown was doing! I was with the guys who I felt were the most powerful artists on the planet.

HWT: Are these the things you talk about in your new book?

AC: Yeah, I tell stories. How I grew up and when I came to New York, the different people I met, what I did, my experience living as a photographer, as an artist. You can read it in one sitting! I'm getting good comments from people, regular folks, they love it.

HWT: I'm grateful to get this opportunity to talk to you. It's given me a chance to see things I hadn't seen and known before.

AC: Cool, because I appreciate what you're doing, man. Question Bridge was a great concept! And the other stuff you are doing is great too—the Nike series with the branding and the body and the basketball and the chain—all of that is great.

HWT: It means a lot to me to hear you know about this stuff.

AC: It deals with society to a certain degree, but it's your vision. That's what I think a lot of these young photographers are missing— they have to deal with their own vision. I call a lot of the younger photographers today visual entertainers.

HWT: I know what you mean. Thinking about what you've experienced since 1958 when you came to New York, do you have any advice for someone who is arriving in the same city now with their camera and their hopes and dreams the same way you did?

AC: Listen to your inner voice or to your spirit or whatever you want to call it. That's where you'll find your originality—you won't find it looking outside, you'll find it looking inside. It's good to look at other people's work to see how things are done or how really good photographs have meaning and last through the ages, but until you get in touch with that spiritual part of yourself, nothing will happen. We need each person to express what is going on with them, and it has to come from inside. To thine own self, be true, and that can be very hard, because if you stand still in one place, you'll get the good, bad, depression, no money, a lot of money— you're going to get everything that people are moving around doing, even if you're standing in one place. So get out there, get into life. You have to understand living and dying to be an artist and you have to live through the pain and the joy. To be an artist you have to be able to express emotion. You use the good and bad experiences in life. Great art lives beyond its time because it has emotion, and emotion goes beyond life and death. Work has to have life in it. Expression is what will keep you going. Don't let anything stop you from what it is that you want to do, your dream. Dreams become realities. They may not come right away, and if they did you'd probably abuse them.

HWT: You wouldn't appreciate it.

AC: Yes! You wouldn't appreciate it. You have to make that experience in life. But if you're passionate about it, and you love it, then you're halfway there already.

Hank Willis Thomas' art to change the world

NJERI MCPHERSON | 10/24/2019, 2:36 p.m.

Hank Willis Thomas Contributed

Artist Hank Willis Thomas is leaving his mark in the art community, being featured in art exhibits all over the states as well as Spain, France and China. Specializing in photography, Thomas expresses a range of ideas in several ways. Moreover, he has given other artists the opportunity to do similar work with the organization For Freedoms.

Thomas was born in New Jersey, but raised in the upper west side of New York City. Coming from a very creative family, he has always had some interest in the arts.

“My parents were both creative oriented, and traveled a lot with their work. My mother is a curator and photographer, and my father is a man of many talents: a physicist, filmmaker, jazz player, [etc.],” says Thomas. “My mother being an artist and an art historian, I grew up following in her footsteps.”

Art has always played a part in Thomas' life. Attending Duke Ellington School of the Arts, Thomas leaned into Museum Studies, focusing on how art was presented rather than creating art himself. But, he later went to school for photography, and this changed his creative trajectory.

“I never really learned painting, or drawing, or how to play an instrument; I never saw myself as an artist. I have just always followed my curiosity, and I was lucky enough to go to school for photography—I could just look at the art and stare, I never really thought I could make money off it,” explains Thomas. “I had friends that worked at galleries that thought my art was worth showing.”

Thomas' curiosity has led him to create art from multitudes of inspiration all over the world. Growing up in New York, and residing in Brooklyn today, it would be easy to assume that Thomas gets most of his inspiration from NYC's vibrant streets. However, in his opinion, we live in a “global society.”

“Artists in South Africa, Peru, Japan [etc.] also inspire my work—because we live in a world of social media you don't have to live in a particular area to be inspired by what people do,” says Thomas.

He has found great inspiration from a variety of cultures and mediums, however, what he finds most inspirational is the idea of evoking change in society. From this motivation, Thomas founded For Freedoms, an organization where art and public discourse can meet. For Freedoms is a place a place for artists to express art delving into topics of civic issues, Thomas hopes to make art a stronger force for change.

“Artists have a lot to say that could and should be shaping our political views and society,” says Thomas. “Fine art at its best challenges us to rethink norms that we have gotten used to; we need creative solutions to create meaningful change in our society.”

The artist has definitely presented art capable of sparking engaging discourse. With much of his work bringing attention to issues of race in the U.S., Thomas has made an impact with striking images that evoke in-depth thought. Still, with all of his success, he still feels insecurity in his creative process.

“I think there is always a question of if I am doing something important, something relevant to be done—a concern that my work is worth people’s time,” says Thomas.

Still, he continues to produce art that he feels is relevant and meaningful.

“I hope that my work asks good questions about the society we live in and talks more about the things we take for granted, whether that be what we consume, the news, history—not giving in to the narrative that is sold to us,” says Thomas “I hope to express that there is always more to the story than what is in the frame of the camera. I see art in everything, I think at it’s best we don’t separate art from life.”

In Portland, Falling Stars Shine a Light on Gun Violence

A personal loss, in part, drives the artist Hank Willis Thomas to confront one of the biggest fears among African-American men.

By Hilarie M. Sheets

Oct. 23, 2019

In the soaring atrium at the entrance to Hank Willis Thomas's exhibition "All Things Being Equal..." at the Portland Art Museum, a circle of 28-foot-long blue banners stitched with rows of white stars descends to the ground. Titled "14,719," this immersive chapel of falling stars echoes elements of the American flag and commemorates the number of individuals shot and killed in the United States in 2018.

"The most likely way for young African-American men to die is by gun violence," Mr. Thomas, a conceptual artist, said in his Brooklyn studio on the eve of his first major museum survey. The Portland, Ore., show, which opened this month, includes some 90 photographs, sculptures, installations, videos and collaborative public art projects that shine a light on painful American stories and the aspiration for social justice. "But all you have to be is alive in America and you can fall victim to gun violence," Mr. Thomas said.

This urgent societal issue is acutely personal to the 43-year-old artist, who in 2000 lost his first cousin — with whom he shared an apartment in New York at the time — to robbery and murder. "I remember Songha and I joking about being 21 and black and, like, we made it," said Mr. Thomas, ruefully. His grief and search for catharsis have been formative to his development as an artist, one who often co-opts familiar cultural imagery to pose nuanced questions about black male identity.

While at the California College of the Arts, where he received his master's in photography and visual criticism in 2004, Mr. Thomas began "Branded," his ongoing series of digital "C-prints." He embossed the Nike swoosh logo repeatedly across a bare torso like whipping marks in "Scarred Chest" (2003), one of his many images drawing parallels between the violence to black bodies during slavery and the physical labor of black athletes generating revenue for universities and team owners.

"Branded Head," 2003, is one of his works linking the violence of slavery with the labor of athletes.

Hank Willis Thomas, Jack Shainman Gallery, New York

"Hank uses the language of advertising, whether it's actual words or the visual language, to think about the underpinnings that move throughout our culture and how those messages can either uplift or in many cases reinforce biases or racist practice," said Julia Dolan, who curated the Portland exhibition with Sara Krajewski.

With his childhood friend and fellow artist Kambui Olujimi, Mr. Thomas used the G.I. Joes they once played with to re-enact the last five minutes of his cousin's life in the 2005 stop-motion animation "Winter in America," on view in the exhibition. "As boys in the United States, we're given action figures with guns and encouraged to create scenarios based around violence," he said. "We then turn around and say it's a shame when gun violence happens."

Mr. Thomas remembers playing with G.I. Joes in the stacks at the Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture in Harlem, where his mother, the MacArthur-award-winning curator and photographer Deborah Willis, worked in the 1980s. "Growing up at the Schomburg couldn't have been a greater subconscious educational experience," Mr. Thomas said.

In his youth, he met groundbreaking artists including Gordon Parks, the first African-American staff photographer for Life magazine, and credits his mother with spurring his interest in working with archival images — "recognizing an alternative visual history of America than the one that mainstream society celebrates," he said.

Mr. Thomas's work is fueled, in part, by grief over the loss of a first cousin to violent crime. Nate Bajar for The New York Times Reprinting Spider Martin's 1965 photograph of Civil Rights protesters facing off against police on a weathered glass mirror, for instance, Mr. Thomas inserts the reflection of the viewer in the narrative and conflates the past and present. Screening other images of social unrest on retroreflective vinyl, he highlights defiant figures and searing details while shrouding the rest as latent negative.

Only when the viewers use the flash on their phones to alter the silvered surface of these halftones (as they will be invited to do in the exhibition) is the full image revealed.

"Depending on where you stand, the image will look different," Ms. Krajewski said. "It makes us think about our relationships to these histories, how our backgrounds have positioned us in our lives."

"Public Enemy (Black and Gold)," 2017, uses a 1967 news photo by Don Hogan Charles, originally published in The New York Times.
Hank Willis Thomas, Jack Shainman Gallery, New York

Mr. Thomas's sculptural works, too, are based on powerful gestures excised from photographs, including an image of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. wrapping his arms around his wife, Coretta Scott King.

In the artist's memorial to the couple to be installed next year on the Boston Common, their disembodied embrace will be cast at 22 feet tall in bronze. "We have so many monuments to war and very few monuments to peace and love," said Mr. Thomas, who lives in Brooklyn with his wife, Rujeko Hockley, co-curator of this year's Whitney Biennial, and their baby daughter.

The artist was also awarded a fellowship this year by the Gordon Parks Foundation in Pleasantville, N.Y. There, Mr. Thomas's new retroreflective images based on Mr. Parks's 1969 autobiographical film "Learning Tree" are on view. "Hank is living and breathing in the footsteps of Gordon Parks," said Peter Kunhardt Jr., executive director of the foundation.

Mr. Thomas has layered stills from the film dramatizing Mr. Parks's impoverished childhood in segregated Kansas with ghostly pictures of him as a renowned artist on the set of "Learning Tree" and looking back at his own life through the camera lens. This framing and context is illuminated with the viewer's flash.

"I'm always interested in the story behind the pictures," Mr. Thomas said, "and encouraging myself and viewers to think beyond the surface reading."

The artist's longtime friend and colleague Wangechi Mutu said she admired the "emotional elasticity and empathetic breadth" that Mr. Thomas brings to whatever idea and medium he tackles, as well as his ability to collaborate.

Ms. Mutu is one of some 800 artists who have contributed billboard designs, among other public artworks, exhibited across all 50 states in civic spaces as part of "For Freedoms," an artist-run super PAC founded in 2016 by Mr. Thomas and Eric Gottesman.

"Hank's thinking about the political landscape of the U.S. and the constituents of various space that are in need of the art and activism he charges his work with," said Ms. Mutu, whose billboard Africa's Out! was exhibited in Trenton, N.J., during the midterm elections.

Mr. Thomas's struggles to deal with the death of his cousin, and of so many other African-American men, precipitated another collaboration begun in 2010 called "Question Bridge," a five-channel video-mediated dialogue between more than 150 black men. He teamed with Chris Johnson, Bayete Ross Smith and Kamal Sinclair to fan out across country, meeting African-American men who would pose questions to their peers on camera, such as, "I wonder, black man, are you really ready for freedom?"

"We had five people answer that question and each one answered it dramatically differently," Mr. Thomas said. "We were on a mission to try to define black male identity, because it's so often spoken about in our society, but actually showed that there's as much diversity that exists within any demographic as there is outside of it."

Art World

Art Industry News: A Feminist Monument With Racial Tensions Gets Narrowly OKed for Central Park + Other Stories

Plus, Hong Kong arts professionals are running for public office and Klaus Biesenbach recalls getting scolded by Susan Sontag.

artnet News, October 23, 2019

Sculptor Meredith Bergmann's design for the winning Central Park monument. Courtesy of Monumental Women.

Art Industry News is a daily digest of the most consequential developments coming out of the art world and art market. Here's what you need to know on this Wednesday, October 23.

NEED TO READ

Hong Kong Culture Workers Are Running for Office – Hong Kong artists and cultural workers are running for public office as thousands of young people continue to take to the streets in the city (<https://news.artnet.com/art-world/hong-kong-protests-and-future-of-hong-kong-art-identity-1600474>). The artist Clara Cheung, who is the co-founder of art nonprofit C&G Artpartment, and curator Susi Law have both entered the district council race as independent candidates. Cheung says that fighting for democracy means “sometimes you have to come out of your comfort zone and do more.” The district council elections will be held on November 24. (Art Asia Pacific (<http://artasiapacific.com/News/HongKongCulturalWorkersRunIn2019DistrictCouncilElections>))

Saudi Arabia Plans a Modern Art Museum – The Crown Prince of Saudi Arabia now wants a museum of Modern art as well as an edition of the Desert X biennial (<https://news.artnet.com/art-world/desert-x-saudi-arabia-1673542>). An official announcement by the Ministry of Culture last week confirmed that the Saudi Museum of Modern Art will be built on the outskirts of the capital, Riyadh. Details are minimal but according to a statement, the planned museum will be designed “according to a modern creative concept influenced by the traditional local architectural style.” It will be located near the UNESCO world heritage site of At-Turaif. (Forbes (<https://www.forbes.com/sites/dominicdudley/2019/10/22/saudi-modern-art-museum/#51c882435790>))

Feminist Central Park Monument Gets Approval – A controversial sculpture for New York’s Central Park commemorating American women (<https://news.artnet.com/art-world/sojourner-truth-added-statue-central-park-1623946>) who led the fight for female suffrage has been narrowly approved. Three of the 12 panel members—including the artist Hank Willis Thomas—abstained from the vote. The monument’s sculptor, Meredith Bergmann, has revised her design to hint at the political and racial tension among campaigners Susan B. Anthony, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, and Sojourner Truth. (Anthony and Stanton made black women like Trush stand at the back at rallies.) This is the second design revision: the first one added Truth after backlash that the proposal included just two white women. The $1.5 million statue, the first celebrating great women in the park, is due to be unveiled in August 2020. (New York Post (https://nypost.com/2019/10/21/central-park-to-get-its-first-statue-honoring-women/?utm_source=twitter_site&utm_medium=site%20buttons&utm_campaign=site%20buttons))

A Lawsuit Pits a German Firm Against an Art Dealer – The German financial services firm Fine Art Partners is suing London- and Miami-based art dealer Inigo Philbrick (<http://www.artnet.com/galleries/inigophilbrick/>) for allegedly withholding $14 million in art by stars including Christopher Wool (<http://www.artnet.com/artists/christopher-wool/>), Wade Guyton, and Donald Judd (<http://www.artnet.com/artists/donald-judd/>)—as well as a Yayoi Kusama (<http://www.artnet.com/artists/yayoi-kusama/>) “Infinity Room.” The firm wants Philbrick to return the art, which he had been tasked with selling. The complex legal drama also involves accusations of a fraudulent auction guarantee. (ARTnews (<http://www.artnews.com/2019/10/22/inigo-philbrick-lawsuit/>))

ART MARKET

Dawoud Bey Joins Sean Kelly – The Chicago-based photographer and MacArthur “Genius” (<https://news.artnet.com/art-world/njideka-akunyili-crosby-trevor-paglen-genius-grant-1112516>) has joined Sean Kelly. Bey will have his first show at the New York gallery in late 2020. The artist, who was previously represented by the now-shuttered (<https://news.artnet.com/art-world/mary-boone-is-sentenced-1464904>) Mary Boone Gallery, also has a touring retrospective opening at SMOMA next year. (ARTnews (<http://www.artnews.com/2019/10/22/dawoud-bey-sean-kelly/>))

Christie’s Offers a Futurist Gem – A late, posthumous cast of Umberto Boccioni’s Unique Forms of Continuity in Space heads to auction at Christie’s New York on November 11 with an estimate of $3.8 million to $4.5 million. It is from an edition of ten bronzes cast in 1972, six of which are in public museums. One of the original 1931 casts, meanwhile, is a celebrated work in the collection of the Museum of Modern Art in New York. (Art Market Monitor (<https://www.artmarketmonitor.com/2019/10/22/christies-brings-a-bit-of-moma-the-tate-to-the-auction-block/>))

The Painting JFK Never Lived to Receive Goes on Sale – A landscape by the Texan artist Porfirio Salinas with a historic provenance is heading to auction. The artist was due to present Rocky Creek to President John F. Kennedy as a gift from vice president Lyndon Johnson on November 23, 1963,

PHOTOGRAPHY & IMAGING (/PHOTO)

NEW MURAL FROM DPI ALUM HANK WILLIS THOMAS AT BROOKLYN NAVY YARD

WEDNESDAY, OCT 16, 2019

FOR FREEDOMS' ORIGINAL BILLBOARD DESIGN FROM 2016 BY HANK WILLIS THOMAS AND JON SANTOS

For Freedoms (<https://forfreedoms.org>) is a non-profit organization co-founded by DPI alum Hank Willis Thomas and Eric Gottesman. As part of their 50 State Initiative, they commissioned billboard designs from various artists—one for each state. Their THEY ARE US/ US IS THEM billboard mural is on view in the Brooklyn Navy Yard through November 30, 2019. This is one of For Freedoms' original billboard designs from 2016 by Hank Willis Thomas and Jon Santos. You can find it at the intersection of Flushing Ave and Waverly Ave in Brooklyn, NY.

New Orleans Museum of Art's Amazing Sculpture Garden Expansion Opens to the Public

NEW ORLEANS, Louisiana / May 15, 2019

Hank Willis Thomas, History of the Conquest, 2017. Bronze.

Image by R. Alokhin of Teresita Fernández's commissioned pavilion feature wall.

Sean Scully, Colored Stacked Frames, 2017. Stainless steel, paint.

(ARTFIXdaily.com) The New Orleans Museum of Art (NOMA) has opened its newly expanded Sydney and Walda Besthoff Sculpture Garden after 18 months in construction. The six-acre addition builds on the existing five-acre garden within New Orleans City Park and includes innovative architectural elements and showcases 27 new, recent, and commissioned large-scale sculptures. The sculpture garden is free and open to the public, seven days a week.

“Congratulations to the New Orleans Museum of Art on the expansion of the Sydney and Walda Besthoff Sculpture Garden,” said Mayor LaToya Cantrell. “This project makes the site more environmentally sustainable going forward, and it will help ensure equitable access to beautiful outdoor art for generations to come.”

“Sydney and Walda Besthoff, along with the NOMA Board of Trustees and museum staff, view this breathtaking garden as a gift to the city of New Orleans,” said Susan Taylor, NOMA’s Montine McDaniel Freeman Director. “This project further advances our efforts to unite, inspire, and engage the New Orleans community with the wonder of sharing landscape and art as one distinctive experience.”

With environmental impact at the forefront of planning, the sculpture garden expansion emphasizes the distinctive character of the Louisiana landscape while incorporating architectural elements such as the first canal link bridge of its kind in the United States designed by landscape design partners Reed Hilderbrand, an outdoor amphitheater and stage, and a sculpture pavilion created by Lee Ledbetter & Associates.

New commissions include a sculptural drawing by artist and architect Maya Lin, a 60-foot-long mosaic wall by artist Teresita Fernández, and a glass bridge by Elyn Zimmerman; along with sculptures by Larry Bell, Tony Cragg, Johan Creten, Katharina Fritsch, Frank Gehry, Jeppe Hein, Georg Herold, Thomas Houseago, Shirazeh Houshiary, Baltasar Lobo, Robert Longo, Gerold Miller, Beverly Pepper, Pedro Reyes, George Rickey, Ursula von Rydingsvard, Sean Scully, Yinka Shonibare, Frank Stella, Hank Willis Thomas, Bernar Venet, and Fred Wilson. A work by Ugo Rondinone will be installed in the garden in late 2019.

Artworks by Picasso, Csaky, Brianchon are part of Andrew Jones' successful May 18-19 auction

REJEKT Gallery announces Hybrid Prophecy: a solo show of controversial Polish artist Klejment

Mead Schaeffer Leads Swann Illustration Sale with Moby Dick Design

Swann Graphic Design Offers a Tour Through History

"Primary Colors" Online Art Competition Announced by Art Gallery

Traveling Exhibition 'Calder-Picasso' Explores the Connections Between Two 20th-Century Masters and Is Curated by Both Artists' Grandsons

Lines, Shapes & Objects Art Competition

Saint-Gaudens National Historical Park Opens for Season as Saint-Gaudens Memorial Celebrates Centennial Year

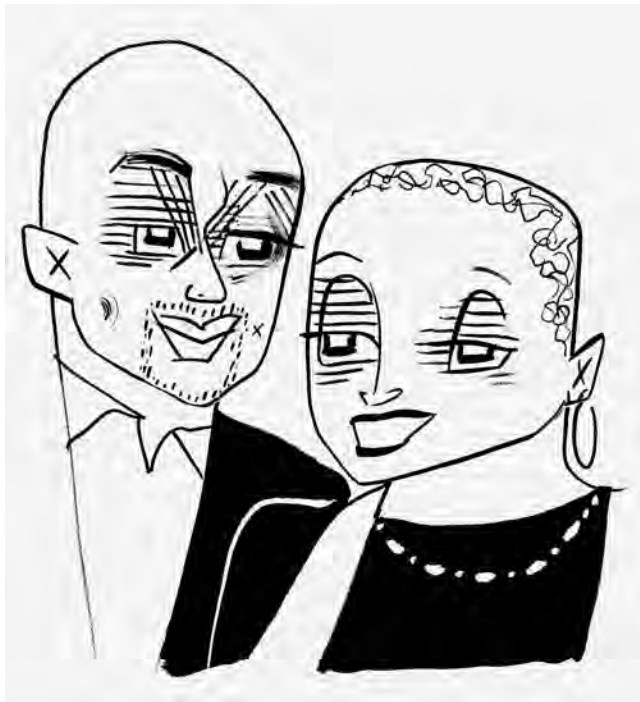

SUGAR MONK - AN INTIMATE COCKTAIL ESTABLISHMENT WILL OPEN SOON IN THE HISTORIC HARLEM COMMUNITY

THE NEW YORKER

Growing Up in a Black-History Archive

For the mother-and-son artists Deborah Willis and Hank Willis Thomas, the Schomburg Center, in Harlem, is more than a research resource.

By Julie Belcove

Hank Willis Thomas and Deborah Willis

Illustration by Tom Bachtell

The mother-and-son artists Deborah Willis and Hank Willis Thomas stopped by the Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, in Harlem, the other day. Thomas carried his mother's tote bag for her as they walked through an exhibit titled "Black Power!"

An F.B.I. most-wanted poster caught Thomas's eye. The hunted man, identified as Hubert Gerold Brown, had a prominent Afro and wore dark glasses. Thomas, who makes politically charged conceptual art, said, "Strange to see sunglasses in a mug shot."

Then he noticed the same figure wearing the same shades in a photo of civil-rights leaders. “I’ve never heard of him before,” Thomas said.

Willis, who is seventy and first visited the Schomburg Center as a photography student, before returning as a curator, peered at the image. “That’s H. Rap Brown,” she said, using the man’s activist moniker. (Brown, who once declared, “Violence is as American as cherry pie,” has since changed his name to Jamil Abdullah Al-Amin.)

“Oh! He was a political prisoner.”

“He still is,” his mother corrected.

Willis smiled as she passed a picture of Joan Baez marching with James Baldwin. “I was asked to direct a music video on Joan Baez’s new album,” she said. “I called Hank. He said, ‘Mom, you’re doing too many things. You don’t have time.’ ‘But it’s Joan Baez.’ Of course I had to do it.”

They continued to stroll, and Willis nodded at several of the photographs, which she had acquired for the center in the nineteen-eighties and nineties. “Sweet memories,” she said. That was before she won a MacArthur Fellowship, in 2000, as a historian of African-American photography, and became the chair of N.Y.U.’s department of photography and imaging. “I had to work late, and Hank was in pre-K,” she recalled. “I would pick him up and dash him back here.”

“When I was old enough to find my own way, I would come myself,” Thomas, who is now forty-two, said. He would ride the bus from P.S. 87, on West Seventy-eighth Street, to 135th Street.

“It was a different time,” Willis said.

“It was a much more dangerous time,” her son said.

“He knew which bus to take: the No. 7 bus; he was seven. I followed him a couple of times to make sure he could do it.”

Thomas’s gaze wandered toward the phone in his hand. His thumb made a repetitive motion. His mother tapped his arm. He didn’t respond. Giving up, she listed a few of the groundbreaking figures who had passed through the Schomburg during her tenure: Gordon Parks, Maya Angelou, Arthur Ashe.

Thomas looked up. “I was playing with my G.I. Joes then. Didn’t think much about it.” Nor did he give much thought to becoming an artist.

“He’d say, ‘Mom, all your friends are broke,’ ” Willis recalled. She said she replied, “Yeah, but they’re having fun.”

Thomas spent hours in the center's research stacks. "Growing up in the archive, I just became hyperaware of the missing images in our society—the images that aren't shown, the stories that aren't told," he said.

Near the F.B.I. poster was a shot of the 1971 prison uprising at Attica, the inmates raising their fists in the air. Thomas used the picture in his latest body of work, which is currently on view at the Jack Shainman Gallery. The series features photographic images of twentieth-century protests—in favor of women's suffrage and the Equal Rights Amendment, against segregation and apartheid. "It's really a reminder that the road to progress is always under construction," he said.

He printed the archival pictures on retroreflective sheeting, a material that obscures the images except when they are struck with direct light, such as a camera flash. "Like on the highway—when signs are dark unless your headlight hits them," he said. "It makes things visible from your unique perspective only if you are shining a light on them. That's kind of a metaphor for history."

Thomas checked his phone again—the latest Trump headlines this time, and his calendar—and reported that Willis's next photography exhibit was scheduled to open two days before his show, at the Shine Portrait Studio, in Newark.

"You're sure on that phone," his mother chided.

"Multitasking. I'm here."

Willis's new series explores people's closets. "I was curious about what made people happy about their clothes," she explained. "My husband said, 'Ask people what they don't like in their closets.' Not one person disliked anything in their closet. That says a lot. They can't wear it anymore—it's too tight, too short. But they have good memories in those clothes."

"You're looking at the closet as an archive," Thomas said. "It's the images we keep, the stories we keep. It doesn't have to be in a library or a museum to be a historical record." Willis beamed.

"See, people don't think I'm paying attention," Thomas said. "I'm always paying attention." ♦

This article appears in the print edition of the April 30, 2018, issue, with the headline "Paying Attention."

Hong Kong's iconic harbour-front has a new sculpture park

ART AND CULTURE

Updated: Feb 24, 2018 08:56 IST

Hong Kong's harbour-front is known for glistening skyscrapers and the sight of container ships navigating busy shipping lanes — but a new art project has added a giant pumpkin, a map of the stars and a pair of disembodied legs to the famous skyline.

The Harbour Arts Sculpture Park, which officially opened on Thursday, is a collection of works by 19 local and international artists including Britain's Antony Gormley and Tracey Emin, Japan's Yayoi Kusama, as well as Jenny Holzer and Hank Willis Thomas from the United States.

New York-based US artist Hank Willis Thomas poses in his sculpture Ernest and Ruth. (AFP)

The series of installations aims to increase public access to art in a city known for its exclusive high-end galleries and lucrative auctions. "I think public art is a unique place to make a statement and I wanted to make a work that people could inhabit and basically become a part of," said Willis Thomas, perched inside a large metal speech bubble.

The work, Ernest and Ruth, is one of two sculptures in the project, which was organised by the non-profit Hong Kong Arts Centre in collaboration with local partners. On the harbourfront, intrigued visitors had already begun taking pictures of themselves with Kusama's oversized pumpkin sculpture on Thursday afternoon, while children played among the other works dotted on the grass.

Artist Hank Willis Thomas Shines Spotlight on the Power of Protest

P.J. Rickards

5/27/18 10:00am • Filed to: BLACK ARTISTS ✓

America's No. 1 protest artist? Forget Banksy—meet Hank Willis Thomas. The African-American conceptual artist challenges ideas and oppression through themes of pop culture. He's gained a huge following in the art and celebrity community, among them art lover Swizz Beats. Whether it's photography, sculptures, installations or video, the messages are deeper than they appear on the surface.

Rise Up, 2014

Photo: Hank Willis Thomas & Jack Shainman Gallery

“All art is political. A mistake that we make is thinking that just because it doesn’t look political that it isn’t,” Thomas says. “The role of art is to actually challenge us to think differently about who we are and our role in our society. And if the questions are too easy, the answers are too easy, and therefore we run the risk of not really kind of evolving.”

“What happened on that day really set me on a path (red and blue),” Hank Willis Thomas, 2018. Left Image without flash, right with flash.
Photo: Hank Williams & Jack Shalman Gallery

His most recent exhibit, “What We Ask is Simple,” is focused on 20th-century protest movements and the everyday people who make up those movements, many of whom never get the spotlight. But how Thomas shines that light is even more interesting. Images might appear one way to the naked eye but change when light is added or angles change.

A man takes a selfie with Hank Willis Thomas’ All Power to All People sculpture in view of a statue of former Philadelphia Mayor and Police Commissioner Frank Rizzo in Philadelphia on Sept. 14, 2017.
Photo: AP Images

NORTH by NORTHWESTERN

Hank Willis Thomas's Unbranded is a haunting take on American culture

By Kathryn Rothstein

8:04 p.m. May 17 2018

Hank Willis Thomas, Travel light!, 1940/2015, 2015. Courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery.

The exhibit brings together about 40 photographs from two of Thomas' series – Unbranded: Reflections in Black by Corporate America and Unbranded: A Century of White Women 1915-2015 – both consisting of advertising images stripped of their original copy text and context.

Thomas worked on Reflections in Black by Corporate America from 2005-2008. He pulls images from advertisements targeted toward African Americans that originally ran from 1968, the year of Martin Luther King, Jr.'s assassination, to 2008, the year Barack Obama was elected president.

A Century of White Women traces the way white women were represented in print advertising images from 1915, five years before they gained the right to vote, to 2015, the year Hillary Clinton announced her campaign for the presidency.

The original source and circumstances of Thomas' images are left ambiguous. Each photo was given its own title, and each title includes the date the advertisement originally ran and the date Thomas "unbranded" it. Other than that, no information is given. There are only three wall texts in the exhibition, which provide broad, explanatory statements about the two series and Thomas' process.

The images are arranged relatively by theme. The first images in Century of White Women arrangement show seemingly independent women embarking on tasks alone. Thomas cheekily titled an image of a woman behind the wheel, "She followed his directions and took a right onto Equal Ave..., 1920/2015," while a woman confidently strutting away from planes, trains and automobiles in the background of an image against an idyllic blue sky is titled "Travel light!, 1940/2015."

On the opposite interior walls, Reflections in Black unfolds. The images show African Americans interacting with their white counterparts in a way that is absent from the advertising images on the other side of the room. In two of the images, a white man is waiting on the African Americans in the image. In "Just for the Taste of It, 1989/2007," a Black couple dines under the Eiffel Tower while being served by a white man; in "Membership Has Its Privileges, 2006/2008," an older white man holds an umbrella in the rain for a young African American boy exiting a car.

The second side of the room features images that use exoticism, orientalization and appropriation, especially in Century of White Women. There are white women dressed as Egyptian pharaohs posing for the camera, women's legs chained together as a man smoking hookah looks on and women in the jungle, one of whom is in a cage next to a man. These images are troubling for their appropriative and sexist content, but also for their banality.

The last image, "She's all tied up...in a poor system, 1951/2015," struck me as one of the most impactful and disturbing. It shows a woman in some kind of shirt or straightjacket with her arms constrained, bucked in, seated at a typewriter, yelling in apparent anguish. This is the only image where a woman is in visible pain, but in a way, it seems to speak for the rest of the images.

After absorbing the entire exhibit, the lack of detailed labels or explanation for each image seems very intentional. Without the protection of copy text, the images alone tell some of the darker stories about American life, appetites and cultural norms through the way advertisers thought the American public aspired to see themselves. The way the images are separated from their original context adds an unsettling element.

Both sets of advertisements espouse similar themes – the nuclear American family, heterosexual norms and traditional beauty norms. And in both series, these themes are similarly disturbing. Examining the vignettes as a group reveals how deeply ingrained themes of racism, sexism and white supremacy are to the American psyche. Although the images were poached from a period of many perceived milestones for women and African Americans, they also make it clear that there are still many milestones to go.

ARTFORUM

POSTED DECEMBER 18, 2017

Hank Willis Thomas Wins Canada's AIMIA Photography Prize

The 2017 winner of one of Canada's largest and most prestigious contemporary photography awards, AIMIA Photography Prize, is Hank Willis Thomas. The New York-based artist's work explores consumerism, class, and race. Thomas will receive $39,000.

Since AIMIA's inception in 2007, the award has been granted to artists based on a public vote. This year's finalists were Liz Johnson Artur, Raymond Boisjoly, and Taisuke Koyama. They will each receive $4,000, and their work will be displayed alongside Thomas's at the Art Gallery of Ontario until January 14. Among the pieces by Thomas in the show is his series of archival images from the American civil rights movement, which can only be seen with night-vision goggles.

"I might consider myself a photographic archaeologist, or a visual culture archaeologist," the artist said. "I believe that all the content in my work is really about framing and context, about calling the viewer to think about how their position affects what they see."

Each year, AIMIA also grants around $20,000 as part of a scholarship program. This year, three undergraduate students studying photography will be given an award in support of their final year of study.

Decontextualized: A Review of Works by Hank Willis Thomas

By Heather Outwater and Morgan Barnett

“Ads really aren’t about the products. It’s about what myths and generalizations we can attach.” This is a quote by Hank Willis Thomas, the artist behind Ubranded: A Century of White Women 1915 – 2015, the extensive gallery show that currently occupies both the galleries here on campus and those downtown at Marketview Arts. This idea is hard to take in, because ads are used to market products, right? That’s the reason we make them. However, Thomas challenges this with the work that he does. Ubranded: A Century of White Women 1915 – 2015 is a collection of advertisement images from the last 100 years that solely follows trends in the media focusing on white women. More importantly, these ads are void of any text or logos to inform the viewer of which product the photograph was initially taken for. By doing this, the viewer is left with the photograph only and isn’t influenced by anything except for their own experiences.

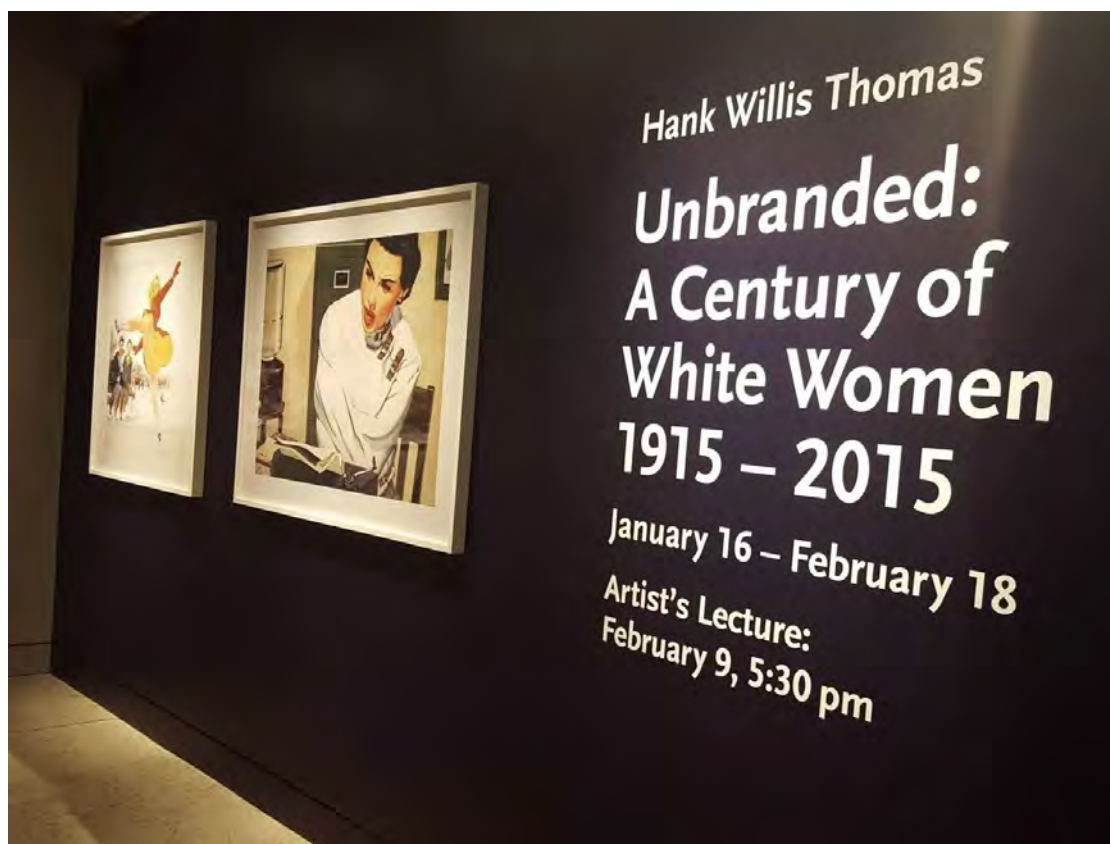

As is true for a multitude of artistic work, the meaning often changes within the eyes of each viewer. This is also true for Thomas’s work in this show. One person’s impression of an image can be completely different from another’s, and everyone has their own experiences, whether they’re influenced by their childhood, where they grew up, or what generation they are a part of. The beauty of these images, being stripped from a commercial theme, is that “You take the context away and you’re left with something that you have to deal with,” says York College Gallery Director, Matthew Clay-Robison. Furthermore, some of these advertisements are very well known and by one look, one might know what the product is. This influences that person’s opinion of the image. However, they still might see it in a different light without the product information telling them what to think. Through personal perspectives, each viewer has their own experience with the art and takes in different aspects of it. It’s difficult to explain this phenomena to a person who hasn’t seen the stripped images for themselves.

There is a wide variety of themes, scenes, and messages in this collection of Thomas’s work. While viewing these “unbranded” images, one can see both the idea of women oppression and women empowerment. She’s all tied up... in a poor system is an image from 1951 showing a woman in a straightjacket. She looks appallingly at her typewriter but without any reference, one does not know if this is a comment on women in the workplace or she is merely frustrated at what's in front of her. Another image is Aggressive Loyalty (1963). To those who know what this image is for, it can be seen as powerful; she would rather get in a fight than give up her cigarette. However, without prior knowledge, one could assume abuse was involved. This guy's the limit is a more recent example from 2000. There is a depiction of a dominant male figure straddling a woman who seemingly has no power and an idealized body. An image that shows a woman in a difficult and powerful position is Failure is not an option, from 1997. One can tell that she is among soldiers and she looks determined and serious about her role. Thomas explores these themes and more in this extensive collection.

Behind all of this, Hank Willis Thomas is a black man commenting on a history of white women. One might ask, why does he have the authority to curate history in this way? One of the reasons is that one of the biggest marketing campaigns is race and for years and years, companies marketed whiteness to get the public to buy from them. Also, the values associated with an advertisement are deeper than the surface and he wanted to explore that in this body of work by taking the context away and leaving only the values. Lastly, this conversation about women and the fight for equality needs to continue, and it's a topic that everyone should be trying to spread.

Thomas allows us to learn about our culture by stripping common advertisements into the bare bones of a single image. "Art is here to challenge us to ask questions. That is something that is really lacking in our media and cultural landscape. We are afraid to ask questions." – Hank Willis Thomas

Is Political Art the Only Art That Matters Now?

The art world is going to war with Trump. If it doesn't shoot itself in the foot first.

By Carl Swanson 7/17/2017

The protests started almost immediately after the presidential election. An artist named Annette Lemieux emailed the Whitney Museum and asked that her installation Left Right Left Right — a series of life-size photographs of raised fists turned into protest signs — be turned upside down. The artist Jonathan Horowitz and some friends started an Instagram feed called @dear_ivanka, attempting to directly appeal to the soon-to-be First Daughter and shame her into pushing her father away from the Bannonite brink. The artist Richard Prince refunded her money for a piece that she bought, then put out a statement that was intended to de-authenticate it.

Sam Durant's light-box sculpture, which read END WHITE SUPREMACY, was hoisted onto the façade of Paula Cooper Gallery in Chelsea (where it first appeared in the remarkably different context of Obama's election in 2008), and another edition of it was set up by the gallery Blum & Poe to greet visitors at the Miami Beach Convention Center for Art Basel the first weekend of December, where the usual luxury-brand-fueled jet-set bacchanal seemed a bit muted and anxious and Nadya Tolokonnikova, founder of Pussy Riot, delivered a lecture by the pool at the Nautilus hotel on the dangers of authoritarianism.

As the inauguration approached, the art world's desire to make a statement increased. Many museums across the country went free on January 20, which was seen as a more productive response than shutting down, as a movement called J20 Art Strike called for, and the Whitney did a day of programs in partnership with the group Occupy Museums. The Guggenheim planted a Yoko Ono Wish Tree on the sidewalk out front, letting passersby record their hopes — perhaps that peace and tolerance might prevail. A collective of artists started a platform called 2 Hours a Week, which connects people with political actions they can take while still holding down their jobs. Gallerist Carol Greene teamed up with artist Rachel Harrison to rent buses to bring a group to the Women's March, armed with social-media-friendly signage.

And it hasn't let up. Each Trump proclamation has seemed to inspire a new round of agitation and action. When the president announced the first iteration of his ban on immigration from seven Muslim-majority countries, Davis Museum at Wellesley College covered or removed about 120 works that had been either made or donated by an immigrant. The Museum of Modern Art hung work from its collection by artists who come from three of the excluded nations.

Establishment Chelsea gallerist Andrea Rosen decided to shut down her gallery, in part to focus on political activities. The anti-Establishment (or, anyway, far less established) Christopher Stout Gallery in Bushwick, which specialized in "feminist, queer, anti-Establishment, hyperaggressive, mystic and/or joyously sexual" art, rebranded itself the ADO (Art During the Occupation) Project. Awol Erizku, the photographer best known for having taken Beyoncé's maternity portrait, just announced his "anti-Trump" art show "Make America Great Again," at which he will sell baseball caps featuring that slogan superimposed on the image of a black panther ("to have something affordable in the show"). And the Public Art Fund in New York commissioned Ai Weiwei for a citywide proposition titled, with pointed irony, "Good Fences Make Good Neighbors."

For the first 100 days of the administration, MoMA PS1 has given over a gallery to "For Freedoms," a collaboration by the artists Hank Willis Thomas and Eric Gottesman for which they set up a super-PAC. The name was inspired by Norman Rockwell's paintings of Franklin D. Roosevelt's "Four Freedoms" speech in 1941 and sought to co-opt the image of a simpler age, as Trump had. Last year, the super-PAC put up a billboard in Pearl, Mississippi, with the words MAKE AMERICA GREAT AGAIN superimposed on the famous 1965 photo of civil-rights protesters on the bridge in Selma, Alabama, moments before state troopers unleashed tear gas and beat them with billy clubs.

The billboard is on display at PS1, its meaning having shifted after the election. Intensified. This happened often with artworks made in the run-up to the election; they just looked different afterward. Maurizio Cattelan's solid-gold toilet, titled America, which was installed at the Guggenheim last September, suddenly felt spot-on. As did the punk-rock political caricatures in the Raymond Pettibon show at the New Museum. What might have been a quiet show of Alice Neel portraits of her multiethnic friends at David Zwirner became a rallying point of sorts for empathy. (See Cyrus, the Gentle Iranian.) The Dumbo nonprofit space Art in General's eerie night-vision installation by the collective Postcommodity, whose members live and work near the U.S. border with Mexico, built around conversations the artists had with Border Patrol agents about how they use decoys to catch people trying to cross the border, now seems extra ominous.

Most prominent of all is the Whitney Biennial (in which both Postcommodity and Occupy Museums have pieces), which was skillfully planned to map the various cultural currents of the recent past as embodied in art. But in these highly charged times, it went from being almost universally well received for its political engagement to being the center of protests when an abstracted painting by the white artist Dana Schutz of the body of Emmett Till was condemned as an example of insensitive cultural appropriation. That reaction would have happened anyway, more than likely, but it ignited into something more rancorous (enough so to end up being discussed on The View) because, right now, the art world is on a perpetual boil. Whether this ideological high alert will produce good art is one question; whether the art will do any good is another.

"The left," says the artist Marilyn Minter when we start talking about the Till controversy, "always eats its own." We are at her studio in the West 30s. She's invited over some members of the protest cell she's a part of, Halt Action Group (which is behind @dear_ivanka), made up of members of the art world and those in its near orbit. While we're waiting, one of her assistants finesses the design on her computer for a banner with the word RESIST emblazoned across it, for the upcoming Creative Time "Pledges of Allegiance" project, which asked artists to make banners expressing what they feel America stands for, or should. Another assistant sits at a table next to us painting one of Minter's almost shockingly sincere commemorative plaques with Trump's face embossed above the full text of his "grab them by the pussy" swordsman's soliloquy in elegant gold type, like a historical marker for a Civil War battle on the side of a road.

Famous for her glittery, glamorously grotesque paintings and photographs of lips and eyes and shoes, Minter, at 68, has become one of the more beloved figures in the art world — a little bit Courtney Love and a little bit Auntie Mame. Her politics are passionate, generous, and of course very much of her generation. (For a while, in the 1990s, she was on the outs among certain feminist critics for being a bit too pornographic in her work, which at the time meant she was considered sexist.)

"I was born in Louisiana and grew up in Florida," she explains. "I was radicalized because of civil rights." She's old enough to recall when her doctor wouldn't give her birth-control pills because she wasn't married — so she went to Planned Parenthood. Then, a couple of years back, she heard about the draconian new Texas and Ohio laws restricting access to abortion. The right to an abortion — she'd once had one herself — is something she remembered people not having. The idea that people might not, again, seemed inconceivable to her. And so she started fund-raising for the organization, getting other big artists (including "the boys" like Richard Prince) to donate pieces for auction. Among many things she finds unacceptable is Trump's crusade against Planned Parenthood.

Her latest retrospective, "Pretty/Dirty," opened the week before Election Day at the Brooklyn Museum. The show was to kick off that institution's cavalcade of progressive programing called "A Year of Yes: Reimagining Feminism," with the stated goal of "expanding feminism from the struggle for gender parity to embrace broader social-justice issues of tolerance, inclusion, and diversity." It was timed to coincide with the tenth anniversary of the museum's Elizabeth A. Sackler Center for Feminist Art, but it was supposed to be well timed in other ways, too: We were about to elect the first woman president!

After Trump won, the meaning of the "Year of Yes" became the "Fear of No." Minter was contacted by a few friends whom she'd worked with on Planned Parenthood fund-raising, and soon an ad hoc group had formed. They decided to target Ivanka Trump, who had over the years studiously exfoliated her father's vulgarity to establish herself as a hardworking, clean-living Manhattan heiress, earnest and anodyne enough to be friendly with Chelsea Clinton and concerned enough with her social position as a person of taste and enlightenment to collect art. They did a protest next to the Puck Building, which Ivanka's husband, Jared Kushner, had redeveloped as luxury housing, and launched @dear_ivanka. A Halt volunteer who is a psychotherapist helped fine-tune the group's posts to push Ivanka's buttons. The first one, with a picture of her in a red dress, read: "Dear Ivanka, I'm afraid of the swastikas spray painted on my park."

Was all this maybe a bit too blunt, even juvenile? Possibly. But Ivanka, like her father, seems to want to be liked. "I know Dear Ivanka is working," says Minter. "She's not following me on Instagram anymore and she used to."

The project got press (and 25,000 followers), and Minter and her friends began gathering other art-world pooh-bahs who wanted to be involved. They're thinking of what they'll do next. Horowitz has since left and started another anti-Trump Instagram feed, @dailytrumpet. The rest of Halt wants to sell the plaques in the Brooklyn Museum's gift shop to raise money for more activities. There are plans to go national, with Halt L.A. and Halt Austin. "I don't think I'm trying to reach the Trump supporters," Minter tells me. "I think we're trying to reach the 90 million people who didn't vote. If we become the tea party from the left, we're going to kill them."

Gina Nanni, the prominent arts publicist, and artist Xaviera Simmons arrive at the studio. Both are Halt members.

"I remember making politically engaged art two, three years ago, and you were a little on the outs" among collectors, curators, and the chattering critic class, says Simmons. "And now you can't get money in the door fast enough from the creative class."

"Don't you think that this election has changed everything for all of us?" Nanni asks. "I don't look at fashion shows anymore. Who cares?"

"Art about art just isn't working anymore for me," says Minter.

"It's not okay to just write a check. It's all-out war," says Nanni, who had been part of a different politically motivated arts collective, Downtown 4 Democracy, which in 2003 raised money to defeat George W. Bush. Many of the members were Howard Dean supporters (Nanni liked Bernie Sanders this time around). "Our goal was to get our cultural heroes involved, to get people off their butts. Lou Reed, Susan Sontag ..." In other words, make politics cool again for the rigorously over it. "We did a lot of artists projects," she says. "We got Marc Jacobs to do political T-shirts. I remember a New York Times reporter called me — someone not very friendly — predicting Marc Jacobs's demise for doing this. But the opposite happened. People were lined up down the block. People just didn't know what to do then: Nobody knew how to participate. You were just arguing over the dinner table."

"What do you guys think of the people who say that this was the best thing that's happened to left?" asks Simmons. "It woke us up."

"Madonna said that," Minter points out, at an event she did at the Brooklyn Museum, the day before the inauguration (Minter had invited her). "Well, the resistance is working. That must give you some hope."

It's not that the art world had been asleep, exactly. Groups like Occupy Museums tried to call people's attention to a supposedly liberal system's hypocritical inequities: its class and race problems, its being in the general service of its plutocratic and corporate patrons, however well meaning those patrons may be. But the Obama years were very good ones for contemporary art, and not always, if you thought about it too hard, for the best reasons. Maybe even for some of the reasons that Trump and the other populists and neo-nationalists point to as justifying their rise. As the global rich got more globally rich, they bellied up to contemporary art's movable feast. Prices went up, as did attendance at an expanding and well-publicized global itinerary of art fairs, biennials, and museums, many of them privately owned, often in alliance with luxury brands. Kanye West and Lady Gaga and, yes, Madonna wanted to be involved. The aesthetic or intellectual novelty and subversiveness of the art itself often became muted by its plush setting, its intentions hard to discern while downing Ruinart Champagne from the cart that plied the aisles of Art Basel in Miami Beach.

None of this is new: Most artists, like most of us, want and enjoy success and like to live well. But did the boom ruin art's ability to have moral authority? Can you resist while also being on the VIP list? As one dealer of multimillion-dollar art put it to me, "The art world just doesn't feel as relevant. They don't go to the places that voted for him. Lena Dunham doesn't know these people. Posting on Instagram isn't resistance; it just means that you pose as resistance."

That's the danger — that the art feels like posturing more than protest. "We know how trendy the art world is," Hank Willis Thomas says. "And this is just on trend. After 15 years of doing art in one way, it's great to be on trend. What happens when the trend is over is the question."

There is a larger conceptual problem for artists protesting Trump, which is how to actually go about effectively doing it. What can the artists themselves do to go up against the policies of a president who is, in many ways, a kind of performance artist himself? How do the discontented, visionary weirdos muck with our reality when creating alternative realities is now the purview of our say-anything postmodern mad king? What do clever artists do when the world itself has become so darkly clever?

It doesn't help that the fringe and the center seem to have switched places, that the person in the White House and his most noxious supporters have cast themselves as the true outsiders. Last October, Lucian Wintrich, a preppy provocateur who now has press credentials at the White House, put on what was billed as a pro-Trump art show in Chelsea called "#DaddyWillSaveUs: Make Art Great Again!," featuring work by Milo Yiannopoulos and Martin Shkreli. It was boorish and desperate, but he had a point when he later told The New Yorker, in all seriousness, "Good art should be transgressive. These days, it seems, the best way to be transgressive is simply to be a white, male, proudly pro-American conservative."

The Whitney Biennial at first seemed like a precisely calibrated response to those white male conservatives (not that most of them would ever see it). The show had been conceived under the subtle assumption that Clinton would likely win, and yet its themes — racism, inequity, censorship — were even better suited to our current political moment. But then, on March 17, the first day the show opened to the public, an African-American artist named Parker Bright stood in front of Schutz's painting with a handmade T-shirt reading BLACK DEATH SPECTACLE on the back. It was a statement perfectly suited to Instagram, and it was widely distributed. Soon after, another artist, Hannah Black, wrote an "open letter" on Facebook calling for Schutz's painting to be taken down and destroyed, explaining: "It is not acceptable for a white person to transmute Black suffering into profit and fun."

The internet — most of which had not had a chance to take in the biennial and, for that matter, never will — reacted as the internet does: marshaling preexisting worldviews and arguments with imperious take-a-side disdain. The New Republic published a much-circulated anti-Schutz perspective; Hyperallergic was more skeptical ("Hannah Black and company are placing themselves on the wrong side of history"); Whoopi Goldberg chimed in (against censorship) on The View. Kara Walker, on Instagram, took the long view ("The history of painting is full of graphic violence and narratives that don't necessarily belong to the artist's own life"). And the artist Chris Ofili checked in with The New Yorker ("Seeing a painting and talking about a painting are two different things. One should not confuse sharp eyes with a sharp tongue"), which ran along Calvin Tomkins profile of Schutz, who sounded a bit tentative and abashed about the whole episode: "I knew the risks going into this. What I didn't realize was how bad it would look when seen out of context."

The museum stood by the painting, although it acknowledged the controversy on the wall text. Mostly its curators pleaded with people to see it in the full sweep of depictions and concepts in the show, which is hardly one-note. On April 9, the Whitney's director, Adam Weinberg, hosted a program to address the criticism and provide perspective. "Against the background of the current political climate," Weinberg said in opening, "the exhibition touched a nerve."

To say the least. The politics of the art world don't always make sense to people not scrapping for intellectual cred as it is defined by the art world, and the situation is made more complicated by the ease of ricocheting commentary and the quick-to-arise mob moralisms of social media. But the worst outcome of the Schutz controversy would be if artists became afraid of that. As Thomas tells me, "I learned that you have to be willing to get your hands dirty if you really want to make an impact. You have to run the risk of being misinterpreted."

In the circulating images of protest that have thronged social media since January, I've been particularly struck by the placards declaring GOD HATES IVANKA and FAGS HATE TRUMP, which took their graphical inspiration from those of the loathsome Westboro Baptist Church (known for protesting the funerals of soldiers and owning the URL "godhatesfags.com"). It turns out they were made by the artist Paul Chan and his small art-book publishing company, Badlands Unlimited.

I visit him and his crew at their offices in a walk-up on Rutgers Street, where Micaela Durand shows me a photo shoot they did of young people brandishing the signs. She explains the idea: "This is A Clockwork Orange, but with minorities taking the lead," she says. "The whole purpose of the shoot is to inspire a type of new courage on the street. They're kind of a look book to try to start a national campaign. To move the signs to the red states."

It's a refrain I heard a lot. Everyone in the art-"resistance" set is interested in doing something that could have an effect on the rest of the country, even those who joined up with the art circus precisely because they were running away from the dreary red state they were from. Chan was born in Hong Kong but grew up in Nebraska. He's not new to politics, but usually his points are more oblique. In 2007, he worked with Creative Time to put on Waiting for Godot in the streets of New Orleans: "Two years after Katrina, everyone there was waiting for something," he says. His exhibition at Greene Naftali, which closed April 15, included some of his "breezies" — ghostly comic-ominous sculptures animated by fans; some of them looked a bit like Klansmen.

After the election, his mind turned to Westboro's signage, which can seem so bizarrely and pointlessly vituperative as to read as parody in the same way Trump and his fans on Breitbart News can. It gave him an idea: Troll the trolls. "We thought: We were angry. It should be hate against hate. The Westboro are hateful motherfuckers. They are really savvy and hateful. And their visual design is so iconic." He made the first signs for the Women's March. Reactions were not uniformly positive. "They were a big hit," Chan says. "People loved them and hated them in equal measure, basically. The liberals were the ones who really hated us."

"They were like: 'God doesn't hate anyone,' " says Durand in a slight singsong.

"We had Evangelicals trolling us and leftists trolling us," Chan says. "Which I think is a good sign. We're doing something right." He paused and reframed. "We're not looking to make peace. We're looking to make everyone else feel just as unsafe as we feel."

Badlands has in its office a map of the country with pushpins in it: The idea is that the group will sell the posters in places like New York and Los Angeles, at artist-run bookstores, then use the profits to fund donations of the posters in the hinterlands. It keeps making more of them; the favorite at the moment is TRUMP LOVES RAPE. The artists are premiering the signs at different rallies.

"We hear a lot about how we shouldn't only preach to the converted," Chan says. But he also sees that the complacency of New York is only beginning to be shed. "Just because you are against homophobes doesn't mean you will step up when someone is being bothered on the subway. What the converted need is more courage, and the people who voted for Trump need a little more fear."

They send me on my way with a TRUMP LOVES RAPE poster, colored pink, yellow, and orange.

*This article appears in the April 17, 2017, issue of New York Magazine.

ART & DESIGN

Artist Sews Together Sports and Geopolitics

By GEORGE VECSEY OCT. 4, 2017

As an American conceptual artist, Hank Willis Thomas has often referred to worldwide themes like power and money and colonialism.

Now Mr. Thomas is using the spectacle of international sport for his first solo exhibition in Britain — “The Beautiful Game,” which will be on display at Ben Brown Fine Arts in Mayfair, London, starting on Thursday.

Mr. Thomas, who was trained as a photographer, has diversified into artistic forms like African tribal quilts, totems and sculptures. In this show, which runs through Nov. 24, he depicts the colors and energy of sport, often suggesting the deeper forces at play in games like soccer, rugby and cricket.

With African players flocking to western European soccer leagues in the last generation, Mr. Thomas used his art to link that with the colonization of Africa by European powers.

Mr. Thomas worked with his associates in his airy studio in the Brooklyn Navy Yard, cutting out soccer symbols and names for a series of quilts, based on “the function and aesthetic of Asafo flags, which have been made from the colonial period to today by the Fante people of Ghana, developed in relation to African contact with Europe starting in the 18th century,” according to the notes from the Ben Brown gallery.

The quilts incorporate techniques used by Picasso and Matisse, who were influenced by African art and symbols. Mr. Thomas points out that the Asafo flags borrowed symbols from the western invaders and colonists — yes, even the Union Jack — in their own military flags, to intimidate rival tribes.

Mr. Thomas's interest in the overlap between sport and national interests also shows in his sculptures of a powerful-looking arm or an implement like an oval rugby ball or a flat-faced cricket bat.

His eclectic references are also seen in his sculpture "Endless Column, 22 Totems" — with 22 painted resin soccer balls, stacked on top of each other and pointing toward the sky — which will be on display in the annual summer exhibit in Frieze Sculpture Park in Regent's Park in London through Sunday.

Mr. Thomas and Ben Brown said that the work was inspired by Constantin Brancusi's "Endless Column," which celebrates the survival of Romania, the artist's homeland, after World War I.

Social issues are never far from the surface. Mr. Thomas, 41, has sometimes used photographs of American athletes who spoke out.

"I can't ignore that there were very many other people active in civil rights, but Jackie Robinson not only integrated baseball but was also part of a World Series team here in Brooklyn," he said. "It changed the world, right?"

He expressed admiration for Colin Kaepernick, the quarterback who refused to stand for the national anthem and is out of work, and noted that athletes are part of the national conversation. "They're not supposed to be political," Mr. Thomas said. "They're supposed to do their job. They don't get paid for speaking. If Ali, if Jim Brown, if Paul Robeson hadn't spoken, what would the world look like?"

Mr. Thomas's work often suggests the dangers hiding behind the rewards and fame of sport. One of his photographs depicts a noose looming just above an athlete about to dunk a basketball.

"Strange Fruit," he said, invoking one of Billie Holiday's trademark songs, about the frequent image of lynching victims.

His blend of art and political awareness reflects the influences of his life. He said his father, Hank Thomas, has been "a physicist, Black Panther, jazz musician and film producer." His mother, Deborah Willis, has a doctorate from George Mason University and is a professor and chairwoman of the department of Photography & Imaging at the Tisch School of the Arts at New York University, where Mr. Thomas did his undergraduate work.

He was a student at the Duke Ellington School of the Arts in Washington, where he became interested in what his mother does, but he said he wanted to be “more than a photographer.”

Much of his work about violence and black lives alludes to his mourning of his cousin, Songha Willis, a former basketball star at Catholic University, who was murdered in a robbery attempt outside a nightclub in Philadelphia in 2002.

In an interview in early 2009 in NY Art Beat, Mr. Thomas said that his earlier work, “Winter in America” and “Bearing Witness: Murder’s Wake,” came after his cousin was murdered “and after years of trying to find out creative ways to talk about issues that were related to that for myself.”

Mr. Thomas recently married Rujeko Hockley, an assistant curator at the Whitney Museum, whose mother is Fadzai Gwaradzimba of Zimbabwe, the assistant secretary general for safety and security at the United Nations, and whose father is Trevor Hockley, an Englishman who roots for West Ham of London. (The Hammers’ distinctive colors, claret and blue, are among the team references in one of Mr. Thomas’s quilts.)

Mr. Brown, in a telephone interview in mid-August, praised Mr. Thomas for adhering to an artistic tradition while examining the powerful presence of sport in today’s society.

He had seen Mr. Thomas’ work at New York’s Jack Shainman Gallery, which has been handling Mr. Thomas for over a decade. When they met, Mr. Brown suggested a London show with a sports motif.

“I don’t think there is much overlap between art and sport,” Mr. Brown said, referring to the artists Damien Hirst (with his love of snooker, a form of pool) and Jeff Koons (who often uses basketballs and other sports objects) and Andy Warhol (whose informal Polaroid photos of sports stars were recently included in Gail Buckland’s well-received show, “Who Shot Sports,” at the Brooklyn Museum).

“You don’t see much of it,” Mr. Brown said, musing that sports stars should be patrons of the arts. “I don’t know what the footballers do with their cash,” he said, referring to wealthy people from “finance, hedge funds, the dot-com world. But sport is very rare.”

However, Mr. Thomas is hardly tailoring his work to depict the glory of sport. More likely, he is suggesting the athlete, however wealthy, is just another rower in the galley.

“Sport can also be seen as a proxy for war,” Mr. Thomas said. “And it’s not a coincidence that the World Cup came around at the same time as colonialism. A lot of football clubs in England were part of the Industrial Revolution because workers needed some kind of leisure time.”

One of Mr. Thomas’s firm ideas is put in his low-key, thoughtful way: “Art gives clues about our values in society. Art is timeless. Your art will outlive you.”

He added, “I believe all art is political. I certainly believe all sports are political. Not only because of the amount of money spent. You have to pay attention to it.”

A version of this article appears in print on October 5, 2017, in The International New York Times.

SURFACE

MAGAZINE
ARCHITECTURE
ART DESIGN
FASHION
TRAVEL

ARTIST HANK WILLIS THOMAS WOULD CONSIDER RUNNING FOR OFFICE

October 19, 2016

IN THE LEAD UP TO THE 2016 U.S. PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION, THE NEW YORK-BASED ARTIST AND SUPER PAC FOUNDER HANK WILLIS THOMAS REVEALS WHAT MAKING ART TAUGHT HIM ABOUT THE ART OF POLITICS.

BY SPENCER BAILEY

PHOTOS BY EMILY ANDREWS

VIDEO BY SOPHIA LOU

You co-founded For Freedoms, the first-ever artist-run super PAC, earlier this year with the artist and academic Eric Gottesman. What was your impetus for starting it?

Eric and I have been friends for a long time, and we've always bonded around our interest in politics. Every four years we're having extended conversations about strategy and what we think should be going on. When we started thinking about 2016, we thought it would be a great opportunity to spark a conversation within the art world about the issues at hand, and draw attention to Citizens United [a 2010 Supreme Court decision that made it possible for corporations and unions to spend freely on behalf of candidates without donating to them directly] and some of the problems with alternative fundraising within elections.

Where do you stand on this year's election?

Where do I stand? Am I standing? Am I kneeling and praying? It's probably the most exciting election that any of us have been witness to because it's reality TV meeting reality. That's a hell of a show. I still think at least Donald Trump was the best choice we had on the Republican side. I'm not sure about Hillary Clinton on the Democrat side. I'm not sure, of the candidates, we had that many better options. Which I think is a bigger problem than being for or against one person.

The thing that's fascinating about Donald Trump is that we just don't know what he thinks. Hillary Clinton has had the luxury and the misfortune of having so much experience. For Freedoms is about the complexities. I think finally we're starting to get to a place where we can deal with the reality that there is no simple solution or perfect answer.

Your art deals a lot with identity and popular culture. But this year your projects have really focused on politics. Is this in part because you've seen a merging of popular culture and politics?

For Freedoms is my art project; it's not my art. It's a collaborative project with about 200 other people. The reasons why I wanted to start a super PAC—because I have my own ideas I wanted to put out there—didn't happen. Instead, we wound up facilitating a space for other artists to use their voices, and for people who don't see themselves as creative to get creative. I've been saved by not having to make specific works of art around the political discourse of this time. What often happens when you

Thomas with a poster advertising "For Freedoms," an exhibition at Jack Shainman Gallery that showcased commissions made for the super PAC.

[as an artist] enter political discourse is that [your art] becomes dated. Part of the reason we wanted to have fine art enter the conversation is that a great work of art is never really dated. We're trying to figure out how to manifest that.

Would you ever run for public office?

I would. That was actually one of Eric and my first ideas, that maybe I should run for office. He's actually the more wholesome one, so maybe he should run for office and I'll be the guy behind the scenes whispering in his ear. I don't think politicians are any more gifted than the rest of us. They're just determined to actually have their voices heard.

Thomas sitting below his sculpture "Counterbalance" (2015).

That idea sounds like it relates to your other ongoing project, "The Truth Booth." Much like a politician, it's a traveling kiosk that's inflated for public appearances. Once inside, participants, on camera, are asked to say what they think "the truth is." What did you imagine that would accomplish?

I come from a photography background, and one thing every photographer is hyper-aware of is their perspective, because of the camera lens, but also their position to the subject. A different angle could give you a totally different insight on the truth of that moment. I think that runs through all of my work: It's all about framing and context, that whoever's framing gets to tell the story. The truth is a contentious space. We thought that by creating a modern-day confession booth, where people can go to tell the truth from their perspective, we'd be instigating and claiming a space for speaking your mind, but also listening to others. Since June, the booth has been to almost 35 states and thousands of people have participated.

the most?

One video I saw, recorded in Detroit, was of a little boy who was making a case for his faith, Islam. It was frightening to see someone, at such a young age, feel the need to justify their belief. He was saying, "It's a religion of love. All we want is love, like everyone else. We worship the same god that you worship." What world do we live in that a little boy—who couldn't be older than 8—feels the need to tell the world that he is not a threat? That was pretty powerful.

Which encounters have resonated with you

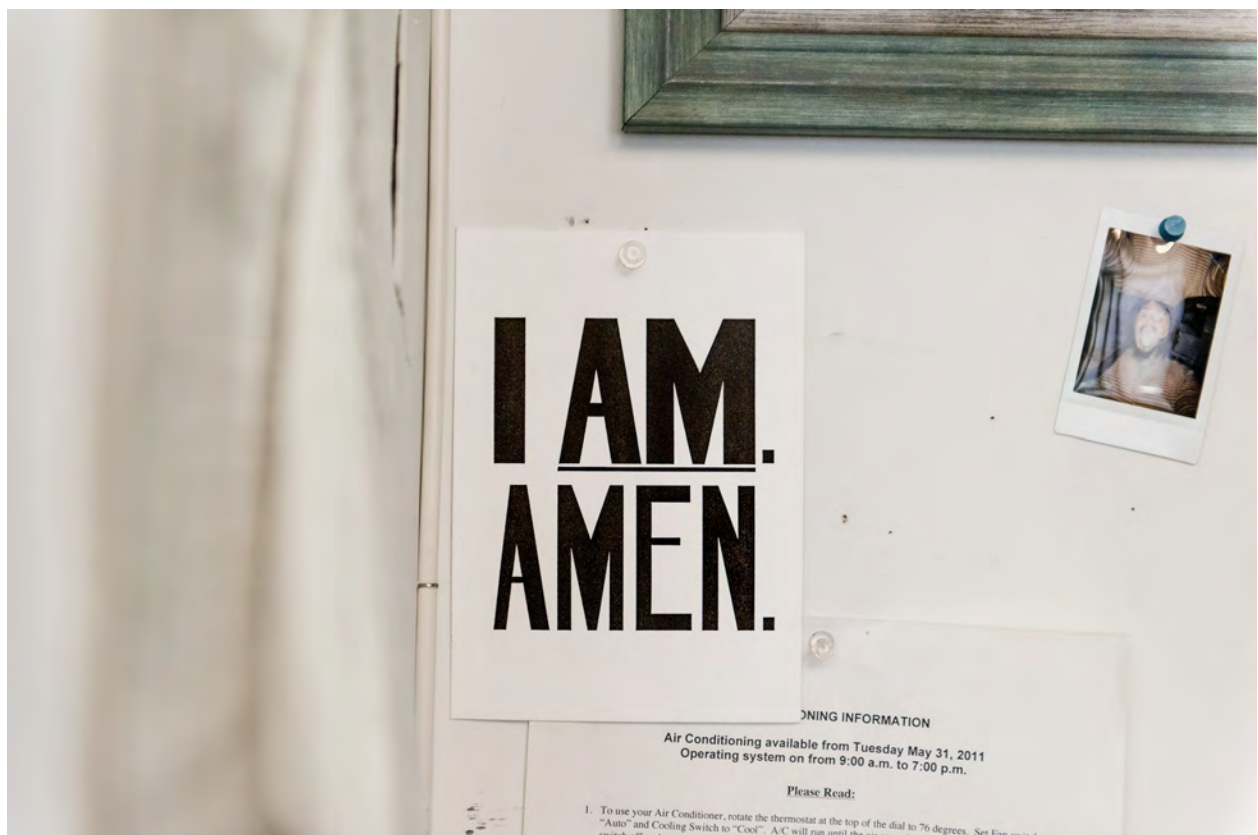

I wonder what Hillary or Donald would say.

I don't think they're capable of telling the truth. I don't think it's the responsibility of a politician to tell us the truth, because we can't handle the truth. That's the reality.

I have two requirements for my president: One, I want to think they're smarter than me, and two, I want to be pretty sure they're not crazy. That's it. I think you can be a good person before you're President of the United States, and I think you can be a good person after you're President of the United States, but while you're president it's not your job to be a good person. It's a falsehood for us to think that you can have that much power and be "good" in the traditional or moral sense.

A lot of your artwork deals with race and what it means to be African American. What do you think has been President Obama's impact on culture and politics?

I think our current president is a fascinating subject, because he's the first clearly multi-ethnic president we've had. He was born in Hawaii, which is two percent black and whites are not in the majority. The binaries we see in the mainland United States of black, white, and other is different than what he grew up with. Then he went from Occidental to Columbia to Harvard to the south side of Chicago, which is a route that very few people take. For a long time, he talked about himself as "multi-ethnic," and even referred to himself as a mutt. People say he's the first black president, but he was not raised by black people and his black parent is not the descendant of a slave. His notion of race is different. What's great about our president is his openness to nuance; he's seen how nuance shapes everything. In my work, that's what I've been interested in. Nothing is black and white; everything's grey. Nobody's black or white—my skin is brown. He's brought conversations that have needed to be had to the forefront—about same-sex marriage, about interracial relationships, about police misconduct, about criminal justice. Until Obama, you could speak in dog whistles and say these really offensive things in code. No one can get away with that anymore.

An "I Am Amen" postcard inspired by a sign used by black sanitation workers during a 1968 strike. Thomas created a series of paintings, titled "I Am A Man," based on these posters in 2009.

Where do you want the projects that you've started this election cycle—For Freedoms and "The Truth Booth"—to go?

When does an artwork ever end? This year, I've devoted my time mostly to collaborative projects: "The Truth Booth"; For Freedoms; "Question Bridge," which just opened at the Smithsonian National Museum of African American History and Culture in Washington, D.C.; and "The Writing on the Wall," a project that highlights writing by people in prisons. All give me the opportunity to listen more than speak. So what's the 2.0? They say the actual true measure of a good leader or a good project is if it can live on after the founder has moved on. I hope people will see these models and improve and build on them.

Have you decided whom you're going to vote for this year?

Yes. But I don't think I have to say, based off of my criteria that I want my president smarter than me and not crazy. Every election, that's who I vote for. Not the person I want to have a beer with.

HANK WILLIS THOMAS

A NECESSARY CAUTION

Kerr Houston

In itself a clenched fist is nothing and means nothing. But we never perceive a clenched fist. We perceive a man who in a certain situation clenches his fist.
Jean-Paul Sartre, Being and Nothingness

Can we take a few minutes to think about Hank Willis Thomas's use of hand gestures in his recent Goodman Gallery show? The show, titled History Doesn't Laugh, was recently on view (in slightly different permutations) in both Johannesburg and Cape Town. And, as Michael Smith noted in a review in artthrob, it was conceived quite emphatically for the South African venues: it featured two dozen new works that were rooted in apartheid-era visual culture.¹ Print enlargements of mid-century mail order advertisements from True Love shrilly proclaimed the value of stretch mark cream and weighted bracelets. A monumental reproduction of a Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) button in fiberglass commemorated the cause in a finish fetish idiom. And several cast sculptures, made of a variety of metals, gave details from iconic apartheid-era photographs by a three-dimensional reality. Even as the work thus offered an extension of themes in Thomas's earlier oeuvre—the social construction and commodification of the black male and an acute, critical use of archival materials and popular visual culture—it now had a distinctly South African cast.

Hank Willis Thomas. Raise Up, 2014. Bronze, 285 x 25 x 10 cm. Installation view of History Doesn't Laugh exhibition, Goodman Gallery, Cape Town, South Africa, 2014. Courtesy the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York

Then, too, there were those gestures. Each of the four photo-based pieces, for instance, centered on hands. Die Dompas Moet Brand! (The Passbook Must Burn!) focused on the decisive, resolute hands of protestors in Eli Weinberg's photograph of pass-burning from the early 1950s. Raise Up emphasized the uplifted arms and hands of miners undergoing a medical inspection in a routine that was first captured and published by Ernest Cole. A Luta Continua and Amandla, meanwhile, granted solid form to the hands of demonstrators in a police van following a 1992 protest that was photographed by Catherine Ross.

The accent upon gesture was hardly limited to the photo-based sculptures. On a nearby wall, Develop Striking Power, a C-print enlargement of a classified ad, offered a single, simple graphic: a clenched fist. The clenched fist was also on display in Victory Is Certain, a staff made of assegai wood that recalled, in form and materials, Zulu examples but eschewed their conventional finial motifs, opting instead for a closed hand. The magnified COSATU button, too, pictured the raised fists of workers. Finally, another button (shown in Johannesburg but not Cape Town) pictured four hands clenching the wrists of their partner—forming, in the process, a powerful square. History may not laugh, we gather, but it is conversant in the idiom of gesture.

Indeed, it always has been—or, at least, the visual record of apartheid implies as much. Look through a copy of a magazine or book of photos from the era and you'll soon gain a sense of the expressive ubiquity of hands. There are the remarkable photographs from December 1956 of assembled onlookers giving a vigorous thumbs-up to the anti-apartheid militants as they are driven to trial. There are Miriam Makeba's hands, elegantly and provocatively pressed against her thighs, on the cover of the June 1957 issue of Drum. There's Noel Watson's remarkable image from 1980 of a 17-year-old Thabo Sefatsa raising both hands in a V-shaped gesture of peace as a police dog snarled at him only a meter away.² There's Graeme Williams's shot of Nelson and Winnie Mandela, thrusting their fists into the air upon his release from prison in 1990. And then, too, there are all of the unphotographed moments: Robert Sobukwe, for instance, letting dirt trickle through his hands as a means of communicating his sense of solidarity to other prisoners passing his cell on Robben Island. Hands mattered in the apartheid era. They were tools; they were signals; they were terms in a larger syntax.

Die Dompas Moet Brand! (The Passbook Must Burn!), 2014. Bronze and copper shim, dimensions variable. Courtesy the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York

Unsurprisingly, then, hands also play a prominent role in recent histories and studies of apartheid, several of which Thomas encountered as he developed his South African work (Thomas previously showed in South Africa in 2010). The Apartheid Museum in Johannesburg, for example, grants much of a wall to a huge print of Cole's photograph of miners, their hands in the air. In related published materials, moreover, the museum has occasionally isolated symbolically potent gestures. In its ambitious educational booklet, for instance, the museum paired the image of the miners with another photograph by Cole (also from House of Bondage) of two handcuffed black hands joined at the wrist. The resulting juxtaposition is understated but eloquent: the positions of the hands in each photograph speak to what Allan Sekula once called the everyday flows of power and the microphysics of barbarism.³

Or consider the terrific and ambitious catalogue to Rise and Fall of Apartheid, the sprawling show of photographs curated by Okwui Enwezor and Rory Bester. In his introductory essay, Enwezor remarks upon the importance of gesture and points to an important evolution: following the Sharpeville Massacre of 1960, anti-apartheid protestors abandoned the thumbs-up sign for the clenched fist.⁴ Just when the African National Congress turned from a nonviolent strategy of resistance, in other words, hands expressed a comparable move from passive support to active defiance. The accompanying images bear this point out and clearly communicate, again, the potent and mutable place of gesture in apartheid-era visual discourse. Watson's 1986 photograph of a workers' strike in Durban includes no fewer than fifteen raised hands: most of them are tightly clenched fists, but two thrust their index fingers proudly upwards, and another lifts a copy of a union paper into the air

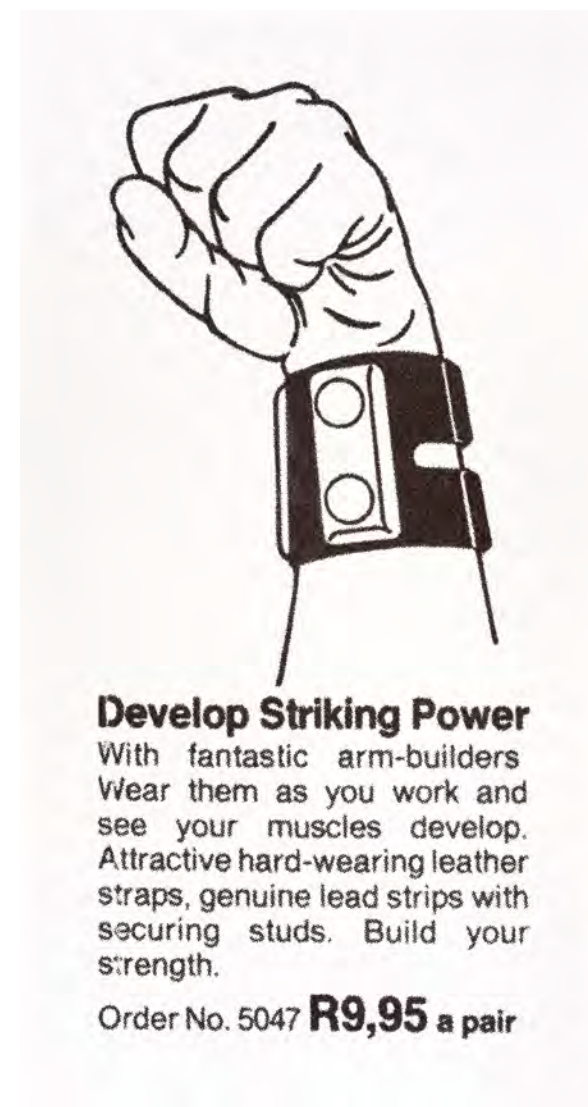

In turn, as Thomas drew on archival and historical materials, he too accented gestural details, but often did so by means of active editing, or simplification. In his photo-based sculptures, for instance, he eliminated numerous secondary details. Many of these were incidental, but some were arguably not: think of the touching pairing of shod and bare feet in Weinberg's original photo of pass-burners, or the papers—the signs of the bureaucratization of labor—that rest at the feet of each miner in Cole's iconic image. Similarly, in the enlarged COSATU button, he eliminated the organization's slogan and created an image, in the process, in which the raised hands of the figures did not have to compete with text. Such decisions allowed Thomas to grant hand gestures a distinct visibility. But they also, inevitably, implied an attendant process of abstraction and decontextualization. Shorn of their original context, the gestures become floating signifiers.

Those floating signifiers are assigned novel meanings in Thomas's work. Take, for example, Raise Up. To be sure, the gestures of the men were already overdetermined before Thomas used them; since they were published by Cole as a part of a book in 1967, they have been repeatedly reused and given distinct new contexts. Indeed, Darren Newbury has remarked on the complicated status of the reproduction of Cole's photograph at the Apartheid Museum, where page spreads from the book are paired with enlargements of single images. "[T]he status of the original artefact," Newbury has noted, "and the fact that one is confronted here with its replica rather than the real thing combine to unsettle its position in the narrative of apartheid."⁵ We might question Newbury's use of the phrase real thing—was any copy of the book more real than Cole's negative, which he smuggled out of South Africa? But his central point is a fair one: in the context of the museum, the miners' gestures are given a new inflection or narrative context. Similarly, in Thomas's show, they are isolated and assigned a title—Raise Up—that invokes insurrection and resurrection, rather than the base humiliation of the procedure documented by Cole. Gestures of passive, powerless conformity are thus converted into gestures of defiance.

A comparable process of revision is visible in the five works that center upon clenched fists. In Cape Town, the works were shown without any accompanying wall texts (a list of works was available at the desk). As a result, the images of raised fists seemed almost to belong to a common, transhistorical lineage: shorn of their fuller context and unlabeled, the fists congealed, by implication, into a coherent and constant motif. The fist, in other words, seemed a common unifying element in what is otherwise a contested history, linking mid-century classified ads to trade union buttons of the 1980s and early-1990s demonstrators. And what if one did pause to investigate the titles of the works? The sense of a transhistorical universalism was only reinforced. A Luta Continua, for example, depicts the hands of protestors arrested at the South African Supreme Court on July 22, 1992, but through its use of a pan-African slogan (coined in Mozambique, it has since been used in Nigeria and Uganda in relation to various causes) as a title, situates those hands as part of a wider and more abstract continental pattern of resistance. Although Thomas's sources were distinctly historical then, his use of gesture drifted toward the ahistorical. The fist was treated primarily as a leitmotif embodying a consistent lineage of resistance.

Develop Striking Power, 2014. Inkjet print on museum etching paper with carborundum flocking, 29.92 x 19.69 in. Courtesy the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York

But as Enwezor notes in the catalogue to Rise and Fall of Apartheid, gestures are in fact complex and evolving signs, dependent upon local variables for their effect. “It is necessary,” he writes, “to underscore the potent iconographical discourse of the image of the fist, as it travels from gesture to representation, from symbol to sign, from signifier to signified.”⁶ Indeed, and in fact the clenched fist has never been a completely stable symbol in South African discourse. After all, by the time that it was embraced by South African blacks in the 1960s, it already bore a range of associations. It had been used by German laborers in the strike waves of the 1880s, when it often connoted a readiness to fight. In 1917, the Industrial Workers of the World transformed it into a symbol of solidarity. By the 1930s, in turn, it had acquired anti-fascist connotations in much of Europe.⁷ In 1956, Life ran an image of Pietro Nenni, an Italian communist leader, raising a clenched fist at a rally, and in 1957 it published a photograph of a Haitian using the same gesture to salute Daniel Fignolé.⁸ Clearly, the gesture embodied a degree of semantic flexibility: it could convey a wide range of meanings and affiliations. But that very semantic flexibility meant, in turn, that local variables mattered intensely.⁹ The clenched fist never had a simple, static meaning.

Usage of the sign by South Africans during the apartheid era points to a related degree of semantic flexibility. The activist Zithulele Cindi, for instance, has recalled his arrival as a prisoner on Robben Island and his confusion at the older, longtime prisoners’ lack of enthusiasm for the clenched fist, a tendency he attributed to a culture of deference fostered in the prison. “So we then had to embark on a defiance,” he later said, “now of the warders. We would say, hey, black style [clenched fist up] and they’d say ‘keep quiet.’ And we’d say there’s nothing wrong in greeting . . . this is our form of greeting. . . . The point of it was to restore their dignity.”¹⁰

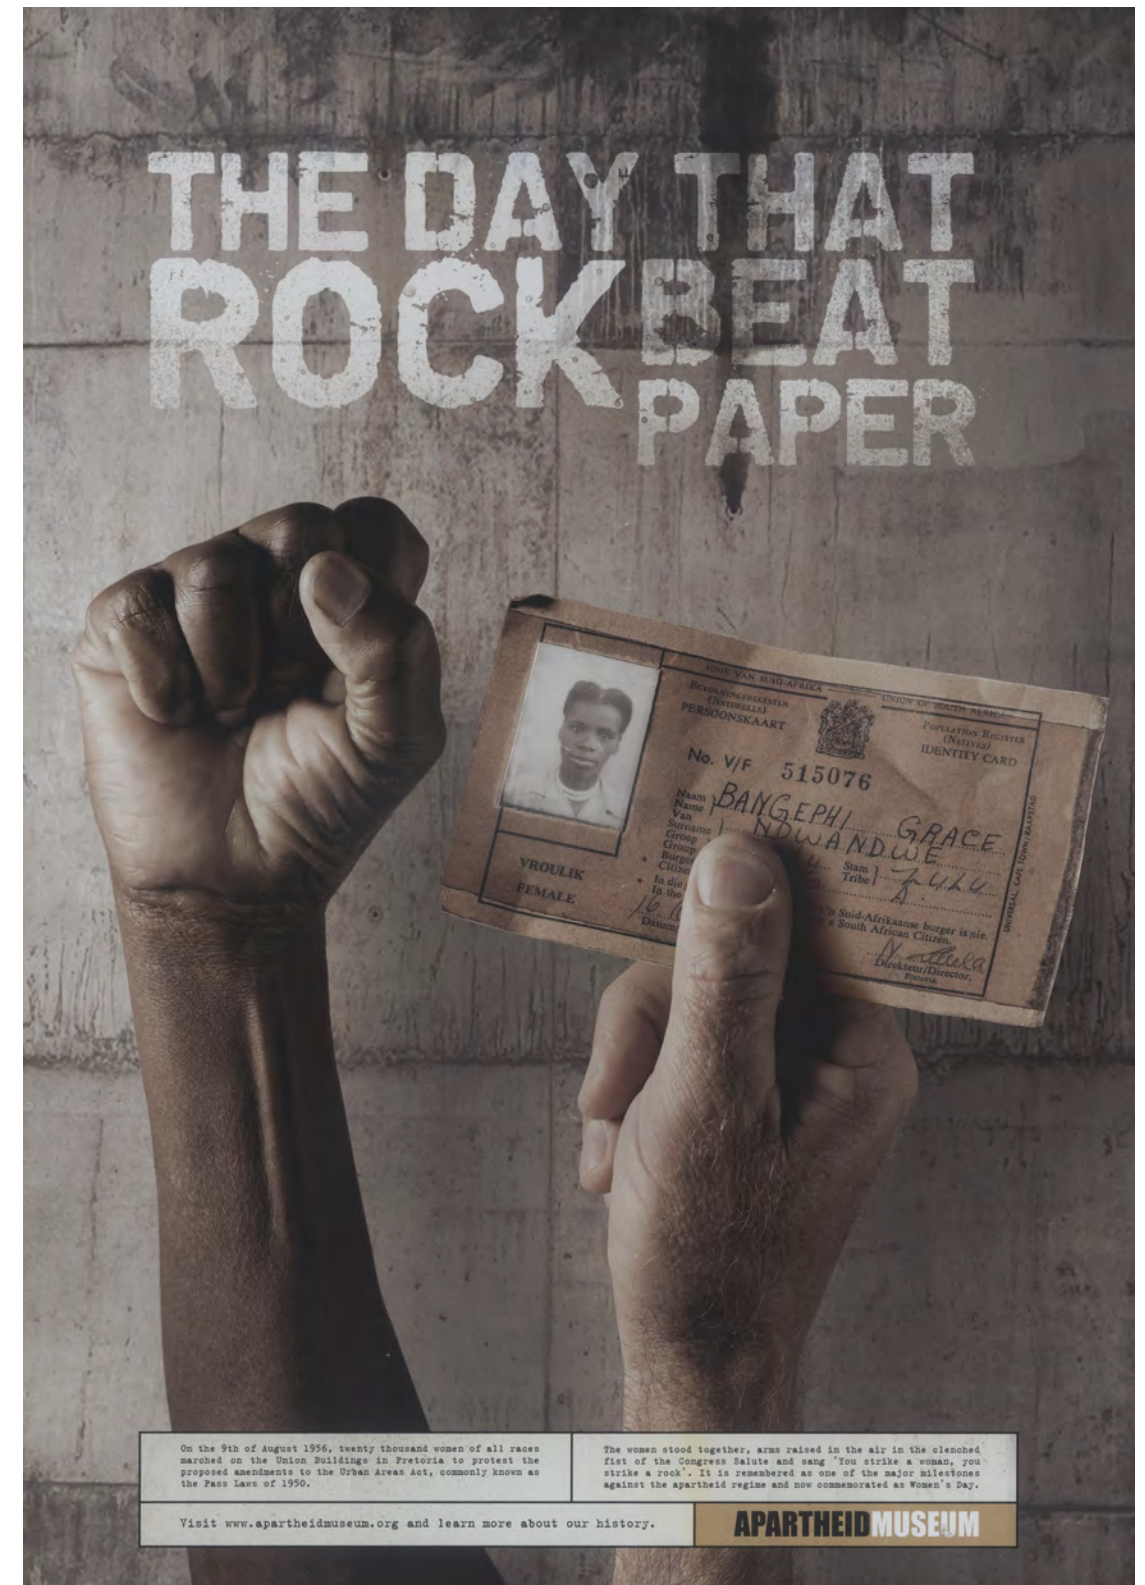

Cindi’s anecdote is a reminder that local context matters and that the associations of the sign were mutable. Indeed, by the 1970s the clenched fist had become broadly associated with the black consciousness movement and also with the American civil rights movement (where it was given dramatic prominence at a 1966 rally by Stokely Carmichael).¹¹

Chief Kaiser Matanzima, for instance, embraced the gesture as a sign of black power and once raised a clenched fist in the legislative assembly of the Transkei, only to cause, according to one report, considerable bewilderment.¹² Enwezor has observed that “it is not only a symbol of power, it signifies self-affirmation, subjecthood and subjectivity.”¹³ In turn, this wide range of associations meant that the gesture, by itself, was ultimately drained of some of its initially acute force, which explains why the Publications Appeal Board had come to feel, by 1987, that “the clenched fist is not undesirable as such because it has lost its inciting effect.”¹⁴ As with all signs, context matters.

Image and Metaphor, Hand and Fist

Given these complexities, it is tempting to call Thomas’s isolation and abstraction of the clenched fist naïve, or historically simplistic. But of course artworks do not necessarily purport to be reliable historical documents; they belong, we might say, to a distinct discursive field. And yet, an artistic context does not simply obviate historical realities, and it is easy to think of examples in which an artistic usage of documentary materials toward a universalizing end can spark heated controversies. The debate regarding white South African artists’ use of archival materials in the mid-1990s offers one relevant example.¹⁵ But also relevant here is The Family of Man, MoMA’s vast, 1955 show of photographs that was curated by Edward Steichen and accented, in his words, “the universal elements and emotions in the everydayness of life.”¹⁶ Dozens of photographs of birth, work, and death taken in a variety of contexts suggested certain basic common human denominators. But the show was promptly skewered by a number of critics, including Roland Barthes, who vigorously objected to its emphasis on shared experience. The photographs, Barthes argued, depicted a superficial diversity but finally insinuated an underlying humanism that flattened difference and ignored socioeconomic variables. “From this pluralism,” he complained, “a type of unity is magically produced.”¹⁷ As with Thomas’s use of the fist, local differences and historical specificity yielded to an implied consistency.

Interestingly, a recent strand of scholarship has convincingly shown that South African responses to

National Women’s Day poster, 2009. Designer unknown. Courtesy the Apartheid Museum, Johannesburg, South Africa

The Family of Man, which arrived in Johannesburg in 1958, varied considerably.¹⁸ Many liberal viewers in South Africa saw the show’s acknowledgement of a common humanity as exemplary: a corrective to the system of apartheid that denied the humanity of a majority of the country’s residents. And some young South African photographers found themselves challenged or inspired by the images on display. Ultimately, though, many South Africans also came to view the show as problematic, laced with what David Goldblatt called an “ideological twist that was . . . not altogether admirable.”¹⁹ Or, as Tamar Garb has since observed, “there is a necessary caution about a generalising humanist vocabulary of suffering and experience; the need to assert the particularity, the historicity of the local, and the camera’s capacity to capture that.”²⁰ It is critically important, in other words, to heed disparate inflections and local circumstance.

What does this mean in practice? A poster produced by the Apartheid Museum as part of a 2009 campaign developed to commemorate National Women’s Day offers an example. The poster depicted a clenched black woman’s fist next to a white male hand holding an identity card; above the hands, a block of text reads, “The Day That Rock Beat Paper.” That text referred to a song chanted by the tens of thousands of women who had marched in protest of the 1950 pass laws on August 9, 1956: “Wathint’ abafazi Wathint’ imbokodo” (“Now you have touched the women: you have struck a rock”).²¹ In bold visual terms, the poster evokes the slogan by means of a creative metaphor: the clenched fist, of course, signifies the rock in the game of rock, paper, scissors. The paper passbooks of the apartheid government are trumped in an inversion of the traditional rules of the game. And yet, on a different symbolic plane, the image is curiously ahistorical. Again, as Enwezor has pointed out, the clenched fist was not used by South African protestors in the 1950s. The poster thus collapses historical time. It denies, to use Garb’s terms, the historicity of the local and accents instead a generalizing vocabulary of experience. It privileges, rather, metaphor.

And is that a problem? In his 1929 essay, “Surrealism,” Walter Benjamin thought in some detail about the relationship between metaphor and image and their places in a committed political art.

“Nowhere,” he argued, “do these two collide so drastically and so irreconcilably as in politics.” He then recommended the expulsion of moral metaphor from politics, urging the Surrealists “to discover in political action a sphere reserved one hundred percent for images.”²² But Benjamin was far from optimistic that this would actually happen. Rather, he seems to have felt that the Surrealists hesitated in transcending mere contemplation and in applying its practice. And he does not seem to have been alone in this regard. In a pair of photographs published by E. L. T. Mesens in the Surrealist journal Marie in 1927, we see two fists, each outfitted with a pair of brass knuckles. In the first image (labeled “as they see it”), the knuckles are pointed inward, ineffectively and self-defeatingly; in the second (“as we see it”), by contrast, the knuckles are worn correctly. As Sherwin Simmons observed, “the images appear to allegorize a public view of Surrealism as inwardly directed self-destruction and the movement’s own view of itself as aggressive social critique.”²³ To put it in Benjamin’s terms, the Surrealist image, printed in a limited-circulation avant-garde journal, was merely contemplative, and comfortably removed from the sphere of political action.

And so we return to the white cubes of the Goodman Gallery, where we comfortably contemplate Thomas’s show in the rarified context of a handsome art gallery. We contemplate the process by which images of gestures of protestors are abstracted and transformed into metaphors of victory and struggle. We ponder the conversion of Cole’s searing photograph of apartheid labor—a photograph banned by the South African state—into a collectible bronze. We stare at the workers in the glossy reproduction of the COSATU logo and realize that this button, devoid of any evidence of facture, will never be worn in any contested public arena. In the process, perhaps, we recall Tom Crow’s claim, regarding 1960s protest art in Europe:

[T]he street-level activism of the late 1960s had raised the stake beyond what any gallery-bound art could offer . . . It was one thing to fashion arresting visual emblems of emancipated perception and response; it was an entirely different—and unattainable—thing to break free from the space of contemplation and the posture of sympathetic witness into the arena of action using the cumbersome means of monumental sculpture.²⁴

The analogy is, admittedly, not exact. But as we study the translation of icons of the struggle against apartheid into an art gallery and find ourselves urged to contemplate the actions of protestors in an ahistorical mode, an aesthetic context, and a monumental format, it is difficult to avoid a certain thought. If historically rooted gestures possess what Benjamin Buchloh once termed a certain sanctity, then it has yielded, here, to something else entirely.²⁵ Something abstract; something, Barthes might say, magically produced. Something, arguably, in need of a certain form of caution.

Kerr Houston is a professor of art history and criticism at the Maryland Institute College of Art.

Notes

1 Michael Smith, “Struggle Kitsch? A Review of Hank Willis Thomas’s History Doesn’t Laugh” arthrob: Contemporary Art in South Africa, arthrob.co.za/Reviews/Michael_Smith_reviews_Struggle_Kitsch_A_Review_of_Hank_Willis_Thomas_History_Doesnt_Laugh_by_Hank_Willis_Thomas_at_Goodman_Gallery.aspx.

2 For the identification of the boy’s identity, see Sipho Maseko, “City Press readers find one of our ‘History Boys,’” City Press, February 14, 2014, m24arg02.naspers.com/argief/berigte/citypress/2014/02/19/7/CP-019-StoryB_30_0_210931485.html.

3 Allan Sekula, “The Body and the Archive,” October 39 (Winter 1986), 3–64: 64.

4 Okwui Enwezor and Rory Bester, eds., Rise and Fall of Apartheid: Photography and the Bureaucracy of Everyday Life (New York: Prestel, 2013), 36–38.

5 Darren Newbury, Defiant Images: Photography and Apartheid South Africa (Unisa, South Africa: Unisa Press, 2009), 288.

6 Enwezor and Bester, Rise and Fall of Apartheid, 38.

7 Gottfried Korff and Larry Peterson, “From Brotherly Handshake to Militant Clenched Fist: On Political Metaphors for the Worker’s Hand,” International Labor and Working-Class History 42 (Fall 1992):70–81. Korff and Peterson concentrate primarily on the gesture’s German resonances. For a brief analysis of the fist’s anti-fascist significance in Spain, see Eugene Cantelupe, “Picasso’s Guernica,” Art Journal 31, no. 1 (1971), 18–21: 21, n. 24.

8 Emmet John Hughes, “Nenni’s Strong Italian Hand,” Life 40, no. 24 (1956), 45–46: 45; Lee Hall, “The Mob and Its Man Take Over in Haiti,” Life 42, no. 23 (1957), 41–44: 41.

9 Indeed, the gesture’s flexibility seems to have prompted, in certain cases, a move toward a more specific vocabulary of usage: in some contexts, the specific orientation of the raised fist also mattered. See Sherwin Simmons, “‘Hand to the Friend, Fist to the Foe,’” Journal of Design History 13, no. 4 (2000), 319–339: 334.

10 Fran Lisa Buntman, Robben Island and Prisoner Resistance to Apartheid (Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2003), 116.

11 For a discussion of the rally, which occurred on June 17, and the significance of Carmichael’s gesture, see Andrew Lewis, The Shadows of Youth: The Remarkable Journey of the Civil Rights Generation (New York: Hill and Wang, 2009), 207.

12 Timothy Gibbs, Mandela’s Kinsmen: Nationalist Elites and Apartheid’s First Bantustan (Woodbridge, UK: James Currey, 2014), 81. Matanzima also declared at one point that the raising of a clenched fist would be the symbol of the Transkei National Independence Party. See D. A. Kotzé, African Politics in South Africa, 1964–1974: Parties and Issues (London: C. Hurst, 1975), 92.

13 Enwezor and Bester, Rise and Fall of Apartheid, 38.

14 J. C. W. Van Rooyen, Censorship in South Africa (Cape Town: Juta, 1987), 109. For an important review of the book, see J. M. Coetzee, “Censorship in South Africa,” English in Africa 17, no. 1 (1990):1–20. Of some relevance here, too, is the discussion regarding variations in South African signed language. As Debra Aarons and Philemon Akach have noted, for instance, “It is a very plausible hypothesis that as a result of apartheid education and social policies, different signed languages developed in South Africa.” See Aarons and Akach, “South African Sign Language—One Language or Many? A Sociolinguistic Question,” Stellenbosch Papers in Linguistics 31 (1998), 1–28: 11. Ultimately, though, the authors argue that “there are a number of facts that cast doubt on the veracity of this hypothesis” and contend instead that “although there are certainly different varieties of the signed language used in South Africa most Deaf people in the country control many of these varieties.” There is no doubt, however, that various national systems of signed language are mutually unintelligible. See Aarons and Akach, 2 and 14–15.

15 For a summary of the debate, and for a qualified insistence that artists are bound by a certain ethics when it comes to the use of archival materials, see Okwui Enwezor, “Remembrance of Things Past: Memory and the Archive,” in Jan-Erik Lundström and Katarina Pierre, eds., Democracy’s Images: Photography and Visual Art After Apartheid (Umeå, Sweden: Bildmuseet, 1998), 23–27, esp. 27, on “the responsibility of art as being not just an interpretation or facsimile of history, but a moral force in the production of a new reality and hope for a damaged society.”

16 Quoted in Marianna Hirsh, Family Frames: Photography, Narrative, and Postmemory (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1997), 49.

17 Roland Barthes, Mythologies, trans. Annette Lavers (London: Vintage, 2000), 100.

18 See, for example, Newbury, Defiant Images, 154–159, Tamar Garb, Figures and Fictions: Contemporary South African Photography (Göttingen, Germany: Steidl and V&A Publishing, 2011), 39, 269, 273, and Tamar Garb, “Rethinking Sekula from the Global South: Humanist Photography Revisited,” Grey Room 55 (Spring 2014):34–57.

19 Garb, Figures and Fictions, 269.

20 Garb, Figures and Fictions, 273. She then adds: “But at the same time, the particular is always haunted by our own sense of our humanity.”

21 The phrase was later popularized as “You strike a woman, you strike a rock.”

22 Walter Benjamin, Reflections: Essays, Aphorisms, Autobiographical Writings, ed. Peter Demetz and trans. Edmund Jephcott (New York: Schocken Books, 1978), 191.

23 Simmons, “Hand to the Friend,” 334.

24 Thomas Crow, The Rise of the Sixties: American and European Art in the Era of Dissent (London: Laurence King, 2004), 150.

BRANDED

On the Semiotic Disobedience of Hank Willis Thomas

by Sonia K. Katyal

In July of 2007, the exterior wall of the Birmingham Art Museum displayed a haunting image. In its center was a photograph, depicting a classic MasterCard advertisement, but with a few key differences. Rather than the traditional picture of a beaming couple embarking on an adventure, (“There are some things money can’t buy. For everything else, there’s MasterCard.”), the photograph displayed a radically different scene. There, in the background and foreground, stands an African American family, of varying ages. They surround a devastated father and mother clad in brimmed hats, glasses, and overcoats, seated, at the funeral of their twenty-seven-year-old son.

The familiar MasterCard logo sits toward the lower left corner of the photograph, and the text scattered across the image reads:

3-piece suit: $250

new socks: $2

gold chain: $400

9mm pistol: $79,

bullet: .¢60

Picking the perfect casket for your son:

Priceless.

On February 2, 2000, Songha Willis Thomas was murdered, execution-style, during a robbery in front of dozens of individuals outside of a Philadelphia nightclub. He did not resist. He was murdered, apparently, for the thick gold chain worn by the friend who accompanied him. There was no other reason. The image of his grieving family constitutes the subject of Priceless #1 (2004), a work by Songha’s cousin, roommate, and best friend, Hank Willis Thomas.

At any other point in history, Songha might have become part of a sobering, yet monolithic, set of statistics regarding black males in America. But it happened that the artist, Hank Willis Thomas had decided that Songha’s memory would stand for something else. So he created the image—photographing his own family at the funeral, grieving over the loss. By juxtaposing the image with the familiar slogan made popular by the MasterCard advertising campaign, he compels us to examine the meaning, the presence, and the absence, behind the very idea of priceless.

After the Birmingham Museum acquired the photograph, it was displayed on its exterior wall. Almost immediately, the piece sparked a citywide controversy, largely because many of its residents mistakenly thought that the photograph was an actual MasterCard advertisement disparaging African Americans. The picture, after all, looked just like a regular MasterCard advertisement. If it wasn't meant to critique MasterCard, then why did the artist use the logo? To confuse the public? Or to send a different message? Initially offended by the image while driving on her way to work, a local reporter broke the story, embroiling the community in a debate about advertising, consumer confusion, and the limits of artistic freedom.

In response, the artist wrote an editorial that appeared in the Birmingham local newspaper. "In the '80s and '90s," Hank Willis Thomas explained, "a lot of young African American men were getting killed over Michael Jordan sneakers. Today, they're getting killed over gold chains, looks, and words." If Songha had died for a piece of jewelry, Thomas explained, Priceless #1 ensures that the image of his grieving family will live forever in our collective memory. "It is this idea," Thomas expressed, "that someone could be killed over a tiny commodity [...] I want to question what makes these commodities so precious that they are worth defining, and more importantly, taking another person's life?"

The intersection of advertising, race, and consumerism is an issue that has long concerned Thomas, a gifted photographer whose work has won both critical and popular acclaim. In other projects from his series "Branded," Thomas juxtaposes the image of a black male with a series of Nike "Swoosh" logos, explaining that he aims to draw a connection between "how slaves were branded as a kind of ownership, and [how] today we brand ourselves." His works are testaments to advertising's power to draw a subtle and powerful connection between the branding of slaves, marked as human commodity, and the way in which we willingly undertake the same task.

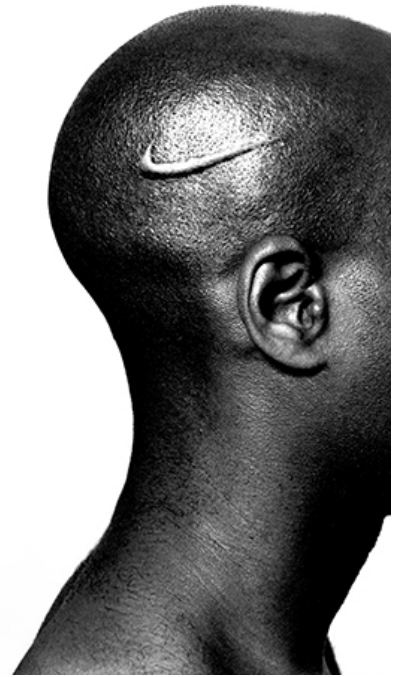

However, although Thomas's artworks display powerful critiques, they also run the risk of falling within a legal gray area. Here lies a curious irony. According to the Supreme Court, artistic expression is entitled to the highest possible First Amendment protection, equivalent in power and protection to that of the purest political speech. Yet the picture suddenly changes when brands—literally—enter the fray. While the law normally protects the freedom of individuals to speak and to express themselves, those freedoms can often stop short when they conflict with the intellectual property rights of others, particularly where brands are concerned. Since Priceless #1 and Branded Head (2003) display appropriated logos, those companies might argue that these works lead consumers into thinking that the works are officially sponsored by the company, confusing the public as a result. And even when court judgments reflect strong protections for artistic freedom, those pronouncements rarely find their way into the army of cease-and-desist letters some artists receive after appropriating a company's brand.

Hank Willis Thomas, Priceless #1, 2004. Lambda photograph/dimensions variable. Courtesy the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York.

Hank Willis Thomas's dual act of artistic expression—and indeed, some might argue, political protest—represents today's modern version of civil disobedience: a massive worldwide phenomenon that I call semiotic disobedience. Today, aided by the power of digital media, thousands of artists, activists, and ordinary citizens across the world—and the internet—routinely reverse the power of advertising, transforming ads and logos into a global conversation between corporation and consumer. For this reason, Thomas's work accomplishes a sort of double irony: not only does he critique the constant pull of branding and advertising, but he also risks being targeted for violating the very properties within the advertising he criticizes. In this sense, his work continues in the tradition of artists like Andy Warhol and Richard Prince, all of whom appropriated recognizably commercial images in order to say something more profound about modern America and its romance with consumption. But while artists like Warhol often escaped being sued for the images they appropriated, in the past, many artists and activists like Thomas can be far more vulnerable than previous generations have ever been.

Hank Willis Thomas, Branded Head, 2003. Lambda photograph/dimensions variable. Courtesy the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York.

CONTRIBUTOR

Sonia K. Katyal

SONIA K. KATYAL is Chancellor's Professor of Law at UC-Berkeley Law School, where her work focuses on art, intellectual property, and civil rights (with a special focus on race and sexuality). Professor Katyal is the co-author of Property Outlaws (Yale University Press, 2010) (with Eduardo Peñalver), which studies the intersection between civil disobedience and innovation in property and intellectual property frameworks. She is also the first law professor to receive a grant through the Creative Capital/Warhol Foundation for her forthcoming book, Contrabrand, which studies the relationship between art, advertising, trademark, and copyright law.

RECOMMENDED ARTICLES

How Advocates of African-American Art Are Advancing Racial Equality in the Art World

ARTSY EDITORIAL
BY MEREDITH MENDELSON AND TESS THACKARA
JAN 12TH, 2016 5:00 AM

"When I see what's happening at the Met, it's almost extraordinary," says Lowery Stokes Sims, referring to the increasingly diverse holdings and exhibitions of the New York museum, where she became the first black curator in 1975. "And to have Noah Purifoy at LACMA, and Archibald Motley at the Whitney. This has been a long trajectory," she adds.

Sims, who went on to hold executive positions at the Studio Museum in Harlem and New York's Museum of Arts and Design, is quick to point out, however, that while the field for contemporary African-American artists has developed steadily, and works by more historical figures have become increasingly sought-after by museums and collectors, there is still much work to be done.

Finding Platforms Beyond the Institution

While mainstream museums have moved at the slow pace typical of large institutions, galleries have used their relative agility to maneuver and respond to the public's increasing interest in African-American artists. Only a handful of those artists—Mark Bradford, Glenn Ligon, and Julie Mehretu among them—have made it into the upper reaches of the market with works that fetch millions of dollars at auction. But contemporary art galleries like Jack Shainman, Papillion Art, Sikkema Jenkins & Co., and James Cohan are bringing increasing visibility to emerging and mid-career African-American artists. And Michael Rosenfeld, a lifelong advocate for and dealer of work by African-American artists, among others, continues to provide a platform for historical black artists.

Interest, Rosenfeld says, has developed incrementally around an older generation of artists like Barbara Chase-Riboud and Alma Thomas, who served as inspiration for a younger generation of better-known contemporary artists. "Even Chase-Riboud is now selling for hundreds of thousands of dollars—in some cases over a million dollars," says Rosenfeld. "However, if one looks at them in relation to other great artists of that generation, there is still a lot of room for growth." And in a climate where museum solo shows by black artists still proportionally lag far behind those of their white counterparts, galleries have stepped in to create institution-worthy exhibitions. Among those was a show by Nick Cave—the Chicago-based sculptor, dancer, and performance artist known for his wild, Afrofuturist "Soundsuits"—which inaugurated Jack Shainman's upstate venue, The School. "That show was stunning and should have been picked up by MoMA," says the Washington, D.C., collector Peggy Cooper Cafritz, known for her prescient taste in work by young black artists.

Left: Portrait of Corey Baylor, Jack Shainman, and Hank Willis Thomas. Right: Portrait of Jacolby Satterwhite Photographs taken at the home of Corey Baylor by Emily Johnston for Artsy.

Hank Willis Thomas, a conceptual artist whose work addresses the construction and use of race in America, also resists this categorization. "I could be a black artist, but I'm also many other things. All of us inhabit multiple identities at once," says Thomas. "The craziest thing about blackness is that black people didn't create it. Europeans with a commercial interest in dehumanizing us created it. Five hundred years ago in Africa there weren't black people. There were just people."

Art in America

June 2015

NEW YORK HANK WILLIS THOMAS Jack Shainman

Hank Willis Thomas: Aggressive Loyalty, 1963/2015, digital C-print, 40 by 42½ inches; at Jack Shainman.

Hank Willis Thomas has created a body of work over the last decade that attempts to unravel issues like identity and race in popular culture. Until now, he has looked most closely at representations of African-American men. His bronze sculpture Raise Up (2013)—a row of cast bald heads and arms raised in the hands-up “don’t shoot” gesture—was on view at Jack Shainman’s booth in Art Basel Miami shortly after the Staten Island grand jury decision not to indict officer Daniel Pantaleo in the death of Eric Garner. The collaborative video project Question Bridge: Black Males (2012), which won the International Center of Photography Infinity Award for new media this year, shows black men of different ages and backgrounds talking about their experiences of everyday life in America. In the series “Unbranded: Reflections in Black by Corporate America, 1968-2008,” Thomas stripped ads featuring black bodies of their text and logos to obscure the product being marketed. In doing so, he made clear what kinds of other things were being sold—underlying assumptions about race, class and gender, tapped into in order to sell beer, cigarettes, cars and sneakers.

Thomas has reprised the same technique in his latest series, “Unbranded: A Century of White Women, 1915-2015,” which occupied both of Jack Shainman’s Chelsea spaces. For this series, Thomas selected one advertisement from every year between 1915 and 2015 and removed all the primary text from it, giving the viewer (via a wall label) only the year in which the ad was made. One gallery showed images from 1915 to the 1940s and the other had shots from the subsequent years. Following the pictures chronologically, viewers could track the constructed character of the white woman, as she moved from the home to the workforce, from virtuous damsel to wild, frighteningly sexual creature (literally caged in an image from 1966, originally promoting Martini & Rossi vermouth).

The conceit is effective, not to mention timely. As Thomas has noted in several interviews, “Reflections in Black” concluded the year that the first black president was elected. The span of the new series ended just when Hillary Clinton officially announced her candidacy. The coincidence made the show’s 1952 Maidenform ad in which a woman wearing only a skirt and bra dreams of being elected seem especially dated. Until, of course, you came to the 2015 ad for a Ram truck: referencing the 1851 painting Washington Crossing the Delaware, it features a bevy of bikini-clad women in place of the brave revolutionaries.

Exoticism, racism and sexism are rampant throughout the images. Some shots (like those involving phallic lipsticks and cigarettes) are made funnier stripped of context, while others are less amusing: a 1967 ad for a brand of pants called Broomsticks shows a girl in a bikini surrounded by five clothed men, laughing and grabbing at her. Thomas’s message in this series isn’t a new one, but it reminds us to consider the extent to which the “white woman” is a social construct, used and reinforced by corporations.

—Jean Dykstra

WM homepage > Cities > whitehot New York

Hank Willis Thomas at MetroTech Commons

Hank Willis Thomas and Public Art Fund curator Andria Hickey

The Truth and Nothing But the Truth: Hank Willis Thomas at MetroTech Commons

By PAUL LASTER, AUG. 2015

Since its first appearance at the Galway Arts Festival in Ireland in 2011, the Cause Collective's traveling art project In Search of the Truth (The Truth Booth) has been exhibited in Afghanistan, at the Cleveland Museum of Art, at Burning Man, in South Africa, and at Art Basel Miami Beach, and it's racked up more than 5,000 videos of people telling what the truth means to them.

Now this bouncy-castle-turned-confessional, that's been made to look like a giant cartoon bubble with the word "Truth" posted on it, is making its way around Brooklyn as part of Hank Willis Thomas's Public Art Fund exhibition "The Truth Is I See You" at MetroTech Commons.

When I interviewed Thomas for the New York Observer in Miami last December he said, "People have talked about failed relationships, about love, and family. They've talked about the notion of the truth, about dishonesty, about what's happening to them right now, politics. The truth is ageless and timeless. The youngest participant is three years old and the oldest ones are probably in their 80s. They're speaking about the same thing from their perspective and no one can take that away from them. That's what I like about it. You're right no matter what you say, if you tell the truth."

While the Truth Booth was at MetroTech on the opening day of the show and will appear at other Brooklyn locations throughout the run of the exhibition, new works by Thomas and his Cause Collective collaborator Ryan Alexiev continue to take center stage on the commons. Twenty-two "truth bubbles," that simulate speech bubbles from comic books and graphic novels, have been installed as signs on the light posts along MetroTech's Myrtle Promenade. Lines from Thomas and Alexiev's Truth Poem, such as "The truth is I fear you" and "The truth is I judge you," are written on one side of the signs in English and on the other side in one of the myriad languages spoken across Brooklyn.

Two steel benches in the shape of thought balloons and a fabricated metal tree with puffed up truth bubbles at the end of the branches that ask “The truth is I love you?” complete this thought provoking exhibition.

The Truth Is I See You is on view at MetroTech Commons in Brooklyn through June 3, 2016.

Scroll through the photos below to see some of the art world players who came out for the August 4 opening. WM

Art critic and Instagrammer Robin Cembalest, Forest City Ratner Companies COO David Berliner and Mad. Sq. Art curator Brooke Kamin Rapaport

Art advisor Katie Howard and her Instagramming dog Miss Pickle

Public Art Fund director Nicholas Baume and collector and art advisor Sue Stoffel

Isolde Brielmaier, director of the Contemporary Art Initiative at Westfield World Trade Center and independent curator and Columbia University professor Kellie Jones

Sutton PR publicists Jen Mora and Madeline Woods

Artist Jose Parla and School of Visual Arts publicist Folake Ologunja

Artist Teresita Fernandez and Kimberly Drew, Associate Online Community Producer at The Metropolitan Museum of Art

Art critics David Colman and William Simmons with Visionaire publisher Cecilia Dean and Colman's dog Gogo

Writer Antwaun Sargent and the Met's Kimberly Drew

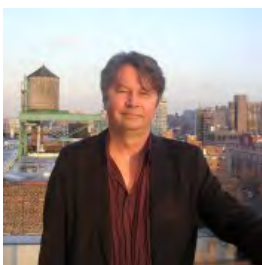

Photographer, curator and photographic historian Deborah Willis and Metropolitan Museum of Art education chairman Sandra Jackson-Dumont

Instagrammers Gabriela Jimenez, Stephanie Strasnick, Rebecca Taylor, Susi Kenna and Armani Smith

Artist Chloë Bass, NYC Commissioner of Cultural Affairs Tom Finkelpearl and Brooklyn Museum curator Eugenie Tsai

Paul Laster is a writer, editor, independent curator, artist, and lecturer. He is a New York desk editor at ArtAsiaPacific and a contributing editor at FLATT Magazine and ArtBahrain. He was the founding editor of Artkrush.com and Artspace.com; started The Daily Beast's art section; and was art editor of Flavorpill.com and Russell Simmons OneWorld magazine. He is a frequent contributor to Time Out New York, Art in America, Modern Painters, ArtPulse, Flash Art, Newsweek, Bomb Magazine, ArtInfo.com, TheDailyBeast.com.

• view all articles from this author

“Greater New York” Is a Bellwether—And It’s Time for Critics to Eat Their Words

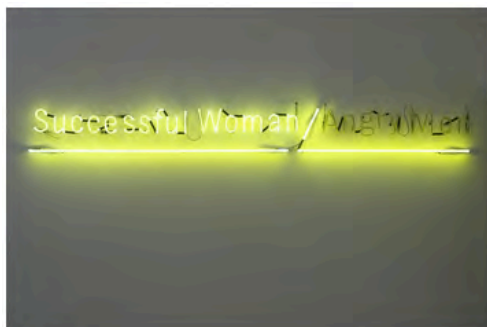

ARTSY EDITORIAL
BY JULIE BAUMGARDNER
OCT 9TH, 2015 10:42 PM

“Youth-besotted,” “a pineapple ice cream soda,” and “a flashpoint” aren’t exactly descriptors that encourage reverence. And “Greater New York,” MoMA PS1’s quinquennial survey of emerging New York-based artists (which unveils for the fourth time this Sunday) hasn’t exactly inspired a legion of critical camaraderie. Nor has it inspired much curatorial approval. Ironically, it was none other than Peter Eleey, the chief curator of this year’s show, who 10 years ago described it as a “flashpoint” in a Frieze Magazine review. Yet looking through the past exhibitions’ rosters, from 2000, 2005, and 2010, the majority of the participants were featured at a crucial moment in their careers, a moment when they either blasted off or faded into obscurity. And most blasted off.

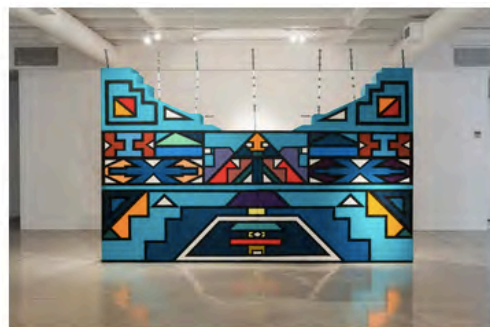

Featured in the inaugural 2000 “Greater New York,” Do Ho Suh exhibited with Lehmann Maupin in September of that year, and has remained with the gallery ever since—not to mention being labelled the “Art Innovator of the Year” in 2013 by the Wall Street Journal. That same year, Shirin Neshat peeled back the New York art world’s provincial bias against Middle Eastern art (in her case, photography), as did Ghada Amer, whose sexually charged paintings would find their way into Gagosian’s hands.

Five years later, the cards were stacked similarly with Carol Bove. That year’s show also included then-rising artists Wangechi Mutu, Paul Chan, and Dana Schutz, who in 10 years time have won legions of awards and major institutional surveys.

The last go-round was anything but amiss, too. Hank Willis Thomas? You’ve heard of him. And Ryan McNamara, Rashaad Newsome, Darren Bader, and LaToya Ruby Frazier—who also just won a MacArthur Genius Grant. Yet the prevailing critical view is resoundingly scathing. As Village Voice critic Christian Viveros-Faune once spouted, “I am reminded of the words of Samuel Johnson: ‘There is nothing uglier than that on the verge of beauty.’” But beauty—and, really, self-actualization—isn’t necessarily the point of these sorts of surveys, even if this one’s title locates it in aesthetic greatness.

Hank Willis Thomas
Successful Woman / Angry Men, 2010
Goodman Gallery

Hank Willis Thomas
Freedom in our lifetime, 2014
Goodman Gallery

--

There's often a schism between critical and market reception. But "'Greater New York' functions, as Roberta Smith put it, as a big-ring circus," quips Fabienne Stephan, a curator at Salon 94, which shows Jimmy DeSana—another featured in this year's show. "I get to watch and concentrate on an act and delve in if I want to. I do look to spot talent in the show." The gallery brought on David Benjamin Sherry after his trippy photographic self-portrait and landscape series exhibited in the 2010 edition. "That's where I first was impressed by Huma Bhabha," says Stephan. "The piece she had in the show, Untitled (2005), was then reinstalled in her solo exhibition at PS1 three years ago and she is participating in 'Greater New York' again this year, 10 years later."

The expanded criteria for 2015's installment—mid-career, established, and previously exhibited artists—may seem to belie the pathos of the exhibition. After all, it is, as Parker says, "always viewed as a platform for younger, largely unknown artists." However, as Thomas says, "survey shows have their place. They revitalize energy within the art world and they take a pulse of the time." And in the New York area, with some 140,000 practicing artists living within its five boroughs, whose median age is 38, suffice to say that many artists here aren't exactly spring chickens.

--

While PS1 and MoMA have lately been reviled for their corporate pockets and distracting celebrity-chasing curatorial strategy, the artists seem not to care. "I was more excited about the relationship of my work to viewers and audiences than I was thinking about my career, which probably wasn't the smartest move on my part," laughs Thomas. For all the drama "Greater New York" has engendered, it's guaranteed to garner a large audience for its current roster, which looks promising.

"The New York art scene is so large and fractured, I don't think one museum exhibition could ever accurately represent it entirely," Parker says, "but from the list of artists included it seems that it is reflective of work made in New York over a specific time period and which may reveal itself to be more contemporary than we anticipate." To quote Samuel Johnson, "The future is purchased by the present."

—Julie Baumgardner

No matter the era or country, artists imprint the protest

HANK WILLIS THOMAS

Hank Willis Thomas's "Raise Up" (2014).

By Cate McQuaid | GLOBE CORRESPONDENT SEPTEMBER 09, 2015

A raised fist, an open hand, arms crossed over the chest. The singular poetry of body language expresses plenty before a word is spoken. Hank Willis Thomas, in a multimedia exhibition at Brown University's David Winton Bell Gallery, focuses attention on bodily gestures, especially in the context of societal power and oppression.

“Hank Willis Thomas: Primary Sources” whips along on many conceptual engines. Thomas creates sculptures based on photographs of historic events, lofting searing documents into the realm of metaphor as he pulls their imagery into three dimensions. He deploys the figure as a choreographer might, making physical gesture explicit and potent. His work, which deals with race, couldn’t be timelier.

Thomas made the bronze tableau “Raise Up” only months before a police officer shot unarmed black teenager Michael Brown in Ferguson, Mo. The image comes from South African photographer Ernest Cole’s Apartheid-era shot, “During group medical examination, the nude men are herded through a string of doctors’ offices.” In it, several black prisoners stand naked, facing a wall, hands raised. Their treatment luridly objectifies them. The photo witnesses that, and sadly also extends it.

JACK SHAINMAN GALLERY, NEW YORK.
“Amandla” (2013) at the David Winton Bell Gallery.

Hank Willis Thomas talks about black lives and the meaning of truth

Hank Willis Thomas's public art installation explores what's true from your point of view

By Howard Halle

Posted: Tuesday August 18 2015

Photograph: David Williams

Photograph: David Williams

The old saying, "truth is in the eye of the beholder," is taking on a literal meaning thanks to Hank Willis Thomas's public artwork public artwork for Brooklyn's MetroTech Commons, "The Truth Is I See You."

The outdoor art project consists of several components, beginning with a series of signs shaped like cartoon-speech bubbles hung on lampposts. Each carries a phrase beginning with, "The truth is...." followed by, "I love you, I hear you, etc." in a variety of languages. Another set of much larger outline bubbles set on the ground serve as park furniture. There's also a flatscreen playing videos of people from around the world, telling their stories by beginning with "The truth is...." These testimonials come courtesy of the Truth Booth, a collaboration between Thomas and Cause Collective. A roving confessional in the form of a giant speech-bubble inflatable, it's equipped with a camera and will make three appearances at MetroTech throughout the show. Over coffee Thomas talked about origins of the piece, his practice and how an early work was inspired by a family tragedy.

Is it fair to describe your work as a critique of the way African-Americans are portrayed and shaped by the media? I'm thinking of pieces such your image of a black man with the Nike swoosh branded on his shaved head.

I've done a lot of stuff about the imaging of African-Americans in pop culture and history, but I'd say I also have done a lot of work that's totally unrelated to that. And in a lot of my very early work, I was wrestling very specifically with the murder of my cousin.

That's terrible. How did it happen?

He went to a club with two friends who were wearing diamond and platinum chains. They were robbed, and the guys who did it made my cousin lay face down and shot him in the back of the head.

Why?

I don't know. My roommate at the time said that the worst part was that we didn't have to ask whether the killers were black.

So how does all of that factor into your Nike swoosh piece?

While I was a kid growing up in New York, a lot of black men were getting killed over Air Jordans and such. I began thinking about how our ancestors were brought here as commodities, and now, our people are killing each other over sneakers. A lot of that was the result of multinational corporations making money by marketing black bodies.

Is the MetroTech project also inspired by personal experience?

Yes. In 2006, I participated in a residency upstate, which focused on international artists. It was during the Israel-Hezbollah war, and the residents included an Egyptian, a Lebanese-Palestinian and an Israeli. When war broke out, they seemed to go to opposite sides of the room. But after a week or so, you'd see them talking to each other, sharing news. I realized they were the only people with skin in the game, so I said, Let's play a game of telephone. The Egyptian person started it off by whispering an Arabic word into the next person's ear. Most everyone else couldn't speak Arabic, but it still came out sounding like in Arabic.

What was the reaction?

The Israeli said, 'That's funny, that sounds like a product in Israel. It's amazing that our countries are at war, but commerce still takes place.' Her observation was a revelation for me: That people who were enemies could share a bond no one else understood. So I started to imagine star-crossed lovers on opposite sides of the wall they were building in Jerusalem at the time, where one screams, 'The truth is I am you in Hebrew,' while the other screams, 'The truth is I love you in Arabic.' But all anyone else can hear is screaming. So I used phrases like those for a series of helium-filled speech-bubble balloons I made for Socrates Sculpture Park. That's how it started.

A lot of the speech-bubble signs you've put up here are in different languages.

Yes, we took the 22 most spoken languages in Brooklyn—Yiddish, Haitian Creole, Serbian, Urdu, etc. And under each sign in another language, there's a placard that shows you how pronounce what the sign says phonetically in English. The idea is that if you can learn to say just one thing in someone else's language, it would bridge a gap.

The way the speech bubbles are hung overhead, they look like the words are coming out from people beneath them.

Yes! It's awesome to see things like a couple sitting under one saying, 'The truth is I balance you,' and they don't even notice it.

I bet a lot of selfies will be taken with them. Let's talk about the Truth Booth. It seems to be a big part of the project, but it's only here for brief intervals, because it travels around the world. Where has it been?

We started out in Ireland, which was great because it's a Catholic country and the project is sort of like a confessional. Then it went to Afghanistan during the country's election. So it was a time there when people felt a real urgency to speak their minds.

How many people have used it?

In Ireland, we got 1, 000 people in one week. At Miami Art Basel, 1,300 people went through it. It's an attention-grabbing thing.

That's true. What drew you to mounting the project at MetroTech?

I just love how people use the space. I'd been coming down here on and off for 20 years, and now I live just around the corner.

In one of those new high-rises?

Right, in of those towers I used to despise.

But you don't anymore.

I mean, it's gotten as expensive here as Manhattan, so I figured if you can't beat them, look down on them.

Since you mention how expensive Brooklyn has become, what do you say to the criticism that public art can aid and abet gentrification, and that money could be better spent on practical services?

Well, I think it's kind of an insult to say certain people don't deserve beauty, because beauty is a basic service. And everyone's attracted to beauty—rich people, poor people and everyone in between. The hope is that everyone will feel welcome regardless of whether you have five dollars in your pocket or $5 million in the bank.

Hank Willis Thomas, "The Truth Is I See You" (<http://www.timeout.com/newyork/things-to-do/hank-willis-thomas-the-truth-is-i-see-you>) is at MetroTech Commons (<http://www.timeout.com/newyork/outdoor/public-art-fund-at-metrotech-center-commons>) through June 3.

THE NEW YORKER

AUGUST 13, 2015

INSTAGRAM'S MARK ON PUBLIC ART

BY ANTWAUN SARGENT

Hank Willis Thomas's latest show continues the artist's decade-long fascination with truth, with black-and-white, comic-book-inspired speech-balloon signs that span the promenade of the MetroTech Commons park. CREDIT PHOTOGRAPH COURTESY JAMES EWING / THE CAUSE COLLECTIVE

Last Tuesday, the Public Art Fund assembled a group of art-world Instagram “influencers,” in the middle of the park at MetroTech Commons, in downtown Brooklyn. They were there to get a first look at the artist Hank Willis Thomas’s new show, “Hank Willis Thomas: The Truth Is I See You,” which is on view through June, 2016. This latest show continues the artist’s decade-long fascination with truth, with black-and-white, comic-book-inspired speech-balloon signs that span the promenade of the park. The twenty-two large signs display statements like “The truth is I judge you,” and “The truth is I love you,” in a myriad of languages spoken across Brooklyn. “We live in a world where English is the most dominant form of communication and so much is lost in translation or overshadowed. You know some languages don’t even have a word for the truth,” Thomas told the crowd.

“Does everyone have their phones?” Thomas called out as he sat inside “Ruth,” one of two steel benches shaped like the speech-balloon signs that he created for the show. “When I was at N.Y.U., my photography professor would say, ‘If you sent eight photographers out to shoot one thing, they would come back with eight different stories,’ ” he told the crowd. Using the hashtag #PAFmeet, for Public Art Fund, the group set off to stage the perfect photographs for their followers. Andria Hickey, the exhibition’s curator, explained to me that one of the conceptual goals of the project is to have Brooklyn residents visit the park and try to pronounce the truth phrases in a language other than their own, to start a conversation about communication and celebrate the diversity of the city.

Gatherings like Thomas's are called "Instameets," and they are designed to give Instagram enthusiasts with large followings a chance to creatively capture and share photos, in an effort to drum up visibility for art exhibitions. It is a method that has spread throughout the art world. The Guggenheim Museum regularly holds #EmptyGuggenheim Instagram previews, along with traditional openings. In June, for the opening of their summer group show, "Storylines: Contemporary Art at the Guggenheim," a select group was allowed in the museum before it opened, and invited to Instagram more than a hundred newly acquired works. The week before Thomas's opening, the commissioner of the New York City Department of Cultural Affairs, Tom Finkelpearl took a group of Instagrammers on a bus tour, to show off Brooklyn's public art. "Before this administration the Department of Cultural Affairs had no digital strategy. We are trying to get the word out," Finkelpearl told me.

In the early two-thousands, Thomas began manipulating popular-print advertisements as a way to expose what he saw as the truth about ads' power to create false narratives about race and sexuality. For his 2006 exhibition, "B@anded," he inscribed scars in the shape of the Nike swoosh on the chest and head of a black model—a metaphor for Thomas's belief that corporate America, by way of its attempts to advertise products to niche markets, perpetuates stereotypes and corrupts identity-formation. He followed that series with "Unbranded: Reflections in Black by Corporate America, 1968-2008," and "Unbranded: A Century of White Women, 1915-2015." In both shows, Thomas digitally removed logos and text from popular-print advertisements he found in magazines. "Unbranded," represents Thomas's attempt to untie the knot that he tried to draw our attention to in "B@anded."

The August meet-up was Thomas's first opening organized around Instagram. But the artist who built his career manipulating photography is a prolific user and has more than thirty-seven thousand followers on the site. "I use it as a diary and somewhat of a sketchbook, and then as an exhibition space," Thomas told me. "Because I know I do work in all of these different mediums and all over the country and in different parts of the world, most people I know won't have a chance to see the work."

Using Instagram as a digital-marketing ploy to promote art helps to increase the attendance and visibility of artists and exhibitions. And it's easy to hope that the desire to take a photo of a piece of art would inspire a wider interest in the art work. But the photographs shared from MetroTech Commons generally lacked the didactic nature of the sculptures that hang throughout the park. One photo shows a visitor posing with her mouth open, pretending to eat a sign that says "truth" on it. Another one shows a woman holding her dog in the air underneath a "love" sculpture. The whole practice calls into question the role of art in society: Should it always be educational? Is there a right way to engage with art? Since 2011, Thomas has been using the hashtag #InSearchOfTheTruth. "People used to make marks on trees to signify that they been somewhere—now we have hashtags for that," he said. Perhaps, for Thomas, being there, and showing other people, is enough.

Miss Pickle is a French bulldog who has a burgeoning Instagram following and who only takes photos in front of works of art. Thomas and Miss Pickle posed on a speech-balloon bench, as the dog's owner convinced her with relative ease to look at the digital camera. Thomas lay down on the bench, put his sunglasses on, and smiled.

Review: ‘Image Object’ Looks at the Relationship Between the Virtual and the Physical

By KEN JOHNSON JULY 16, 2015

When contemporary art ventures into the public realm, outside the protective walls of galleries and museums, the question arises, “Who is this for?” Its potential audience is no longer viewers who are already interested; now it includes passers-by of many dispositions, not all of whom have the time or the inclination to reflect on the aesthetics and knotty ideas that artworks may put in their paths.

Few of the works in “Image Object,” a show of conceptually complicated and visually unprepossessing sculptures at City Hall Park in Manhattan, are likely to stop busy pedestrians in their tracks. But for those who aren’t rushed and are given to philosophical rumination, they can be rewarding to ponder. Weather permitting, this beautiful little park is an excellent place for that.

A Public Art Fund production organized by the fund’s associate curator, Andria Hickey, the exhibition presents sculptures by seven artists who have all exhibited internationally. It’s meant to address a particular condition of modern life: On the one hand, technologically mediated imagery constantly impinges on us from every direction; on the other, images are perpetually being turned into real things, like fancy cars and tall buildings. The exhibition’s introductory text panel explains, “As images are rendered into objects, and objects are circulated as images, the boundaries between the physical and the virtual are blurred, challenging us to rethink how we see the world around us.”

The two-way relationship between image and object is most clearly illustrated in works by Jon Rafman and Alice Channer. Mr. Rafman’s piece, “New Age Demanded,” features two blobby shapes in white marble vaguely resembling sculptures by Henry Moore. Mr. Rafman made them by distorting a digital photograph of a Greco-Roman bust and rendering the resulting images in stone, using computerized machinery.

Ms. Channer went through a similar sequence of converting object to image and image to object to create “Rockfall,” a set of sculptures mimicking jagged rocks. She began by taking photographs of small chunks of concrete rubble, which she then digitally altered. Those images were turned into three-dimensional molds by computerized machines, and the final works, much larger than the original objects, were cast in concrete, aluminum and Cor-Ten steel.

Like Mr. Rafman’s works, Ms. Channer’s sculptures are both objects and images. So what’s the difference between an image and an object? For the purposes at hand, an object is a unique, physical thing. An image is a nonmaterial pattern that can be physically incarnated or reproduced in multiple ways. Most artworks, it can be argued, are fusions of imagery and objecthood.

Because images are constrained only by the limits of imagination — unlike objects, which must obey the laws of physics — they often idealize what they represent, asserting social and political meanings. Works by Hank Willis Thomas and Amanda Ross-Ho exemplify this.

Mr. Thomas is known for Pop-Conceptual works about black identity and racism. His contribution here, “Liberty,” features the cast-bronze arm of an athlete spinning a basketball on his index finger. Resembling a fragment of an ancient Greek sculpture, it's mounted on a truncated pyramid, and the whole assemblage is coated in candy-purple auto body paint.

According to the exhibition label, Mr. Thomas took the image from a 1986 photograph of a Harlem Globetrotter with the Statue of Liberty in the background. Considering that a few black athletes are among the most celebrated people in the world, while many black people feel that they are still struggling for equality and liberation, Mr. Thomas's ostensibly triumphal sculpture exudes an unsettling ambiguity.

Ms. Ross-Ho's monumental sculpture "The Character and Shape of Illuminated Things (Facial Recognition)" has a female mannequin head, much larger than life, flanked by a cube and a sphere; all three elements are painted gray and elevated on a big oblong pedestal.

Ms. Ross-Ho took the image from an old instructional book on photography. Her rendering of it plays with implied feminist skepticism about the fantasy of the perfect woman. A glowing green neon rectangle framing the mannequin's face adds a tangential complication by referring to facial recognition software, which invites another question: Can machines "see" the way humans do? Doesn't seeing require consciousness? But that's a line of inquiry for another exhibition.

Ideological skepticism also animates Timur Si-Qin's "Monument to Exaptation," three tall, sleek panels with the word "Peace" spelled in neat white letters on each panel's sides under a round symbol resembling a yin-yang sign. The panels look as if they were produced for corporate advertising.

The titular word "exaptation" is crucial. It refers to an evolutionary trait that comes to serve a different purpose from its original function. Mr. Si-Qin's sculpture alludes to how the once-radical style of Minimalist abstraction is often co-opted to create deceptive images of moral universality for capitalist enterprises.

As for the remaining works, Lothar Hempel's suffers from obviousness, and Artie Vierkant's from obscurity. Raised on a tall pole, Mr. Hempel's piece "Frozen" is an enlarged cutout of a 1970s photograph of a woman skateboarding, which he lifted from the web. Attached to it is a glowing, revolving rainbow-colored pinwheel, the familiar cursor on Apple computers signifying "Wait." The assemblage comments simplistically on the Internet's bewildering compression of time, memory and history.

Mr. Vierkant's sculpture is an abstract construction of geometric metal planes partly painted in hard-edged sections of color. One of a series of works called "Image Objects" (the source of the exhibition's title), it's the product of a self-cannibalizing process by which Mr. Vierkant turns digital images of his finished works into new pieces.

That procedure and its import aren't readily evident in the present sculpture. Nevertheless, determined philosophical viewers might extract from it illuminating ideas about creative thinking in today's increasingly digitized and mechanized world.

"Image Object" continues through Nov. 20 at City Hall Park, Manhattan; publicartfund.org.

A version of this review appears in print on July 17, 2015, on page C24 of the New York edition with the headline: From an Object to a Picture, and Back Again .

The Boston Globe

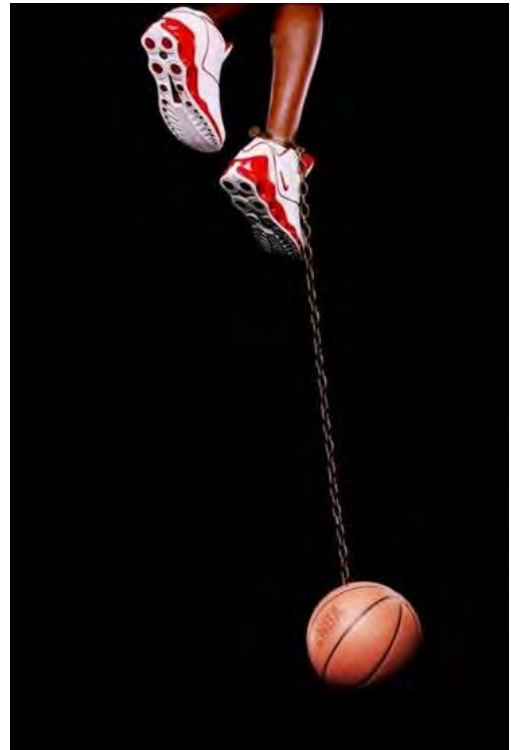

FRAME BY FRAME

Hank Willis Thomas's slick image masks closed door

By Sebastian Smee | GLOBE STAFF JUNE 30, 2015

HARTFORD — Is it an ad? Is it a protest poster? Is it art? And anyway, what's the difference?

This photograph by Hank Willis Thomas, 39, an African-American artist born in New Jersey, hangs in the new postwar and contemporary galleries at the Wadsworth Atheneum in Hartford. It's part of a celebrated series of photo-based works that address, with wryness, precision, and visual panache, the implications of stereotypes pushed by commercial sport.

WADSWORTH ATHENEUM MUSEUM OF ART

This work is called “Basketball and Chain.” And while it is clearly a brilliantly effective political statement, it is impossible not to notice that it is also as slickly distilled as a Times Square billboard.

In fact, everything about it suggests a weird marriage between Malcolm X and Don Draper. You can almost imagine an advertising executive pitching it to potential clients, with suitably widened eyes, and smug follow-up smile.

“An African-American man . . . a basketball player . . . but you don't see his head, or in fact any of his body. . . . Only part of one leg and his feet . . . BRAND NEW sneakers. . . . It's pitch black behind him. As if he's in space. And he's jumping. (Think Michael Jordan. Think LeBron.) He's jumping so high that he's burst through the frame.

“But wait. Is he rising? Or is he actually being dragged down?

“Because here’s the thing: Attached to one ankle is a chain. A manacle. Think prison, folks. Think, if you will, slavery. The chain is taut. And at the other end is a ball.

“Ball and chain?” Significant pause. “Basketball and Chain.” Pause again. “Thank you.”

That’s a parody, by the way. I’m only trying to tease out a layer of Thomas’s work that is easy to overlook, because the image itself is so devastatingly succinct.

Thomas is using the visual language of advertising very deliberately. He knows — and is subtly reminding us — that this language is heavily implicated in the political realities that his art addresses. It permeates everything.

Advertising is about maximum legibility. It’s about achieving a kind of clear reduction of the opaque and obstinate messiness of real people, real lives, and real predicaments, in order to lubricate and maximize commercial possibilities.

In the process it promotes a few (a very few, if you are African-American) seductive ready-made identities. These may be something for some people to aspire to; they may bring riches, respect, a seraglio of self-actualization. Good luck with that.

They may also, for most real African-Americans, work more like the idea of justice in Kafka’s parable, “Before the Law” — a parable that ends with the announcement: “This door was intended only for you. I am now going to shut it.”

BASKETBALL AND CHAIN

By Hank Willis Thomas

At: Wadsworth Atheneum Museum of Art, Hartford

860-278-2670, www.thewadsworth.org

Sebastian Smee can be reached at ssmee@globe.com.

APPRECIATION

Mother as Inspiration, Mother as Collaborator

Author: Ian CofrePosted On: May 10, 2015

Highlighting Hank Willis Thomas, Mickalene Thomas, and Jacolby Satterwhite, curator Ian Cofre explores the complexity of portraying mothers in art through collaboration and inspiration.

DEBORAH WILLIS and HANK WILLIS THOMAS, "Sometimes I See Myself in You", 2008, Digital C-Print

Courtesy of Hank Willis Thomas and Jack Shaman Gallery, New York

In art, classical depictions of mother and child almost exclusively belong to the specific religious history of the Madonna, or Virgin and Child. Historical examples, which include a multitude of masterpieces, represent idealized maternal love and protection, and approach the status of a near-universal symbol. To celebrate Mother's Day, though, is not an exercise in abstract concepts and generalities, but a call to honor the individual. The three artists presented here—Jacolby Satterwhite, Mickalene Thomas, and Hank Willis Thomas (no relation)—have done just that, capturing portraits that reveal the complexities of the women that raised them. The selected works go beyond mere representations of mother as inspiration and speak to a different level of engagement. In fact, they are collaborations between the artists and their mothers, helping to edify their influence through a shared practice.

Asked about the visual history of Hank Willis Thomas's collaborative portrait, Sometimes I See Myself in You (2008), he said, "It consciously comes from following in her footsteps and being told almost daily that I look like her." Those footsteps belong to his mother, the towering figure of Deborah Willis, artist, historian, curator, and author. He continued, "[I'm] not sure I'm ready

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Ian Cofre

Ian Cofre is an independent curator and writer based in New York City, working with emerging and established artists, locally-based and from Latin America. He has previously worked as Director for a Lower East Side gallery, Studio Manager for Mickalene Thomas (2011-12), and most recently as US Director for the 2013 PINTA NY art fair. Recent projects include barriococo at The Royal Society of American Art (Brooklyn, 2014); TEN at Cindy Rucker Gallery (New York, 2014) as one of ten curators; and Bigger Than Shadows, DODGEgallery (New York, 2012) with Rich Blint.

More Info From Ian Cofre

to compare myself to Jesus, yet," but that for him "it's an amalgam of the residue of popular culture imagery manifesting in my subconscious." The photographic transition in the image makes for an honest and powerful selves-portrait, where the physical transformation implies a psychological space divided and doubled, the work shared and compounded through mutual borrowing. Willis Thomas added, "I've assisted her on several projects throughout the years [and] I think this would be the first time we were somewhat on equal footing."

Equal exchange is also important for Jacolby Satterwhite, whose mother Patricia draws prolifically as one way of coping with her diagnosed schizophrenia. Those sketches become inputs for objects that take on a new life in the animated worlds that he has become known for, but Satterwhite went further, highlighting them in his 2012 New York debut exhibition, The Matriarch's Rhapsody. In the titular video, Satterwhite juxtaposes and contextualizes his mother's drawings alongside his digital recreations and family photographs. The meditative video is both an index and display of the commercial products, viable or no, that Patricia Satterwhite invents and designs for TV shopping channels, woven together with memories and moments of personal history that expand through the younger Satterwhite's visual associations. Because of Jacolby's collaborative practice and continued support, the Studio Museum in Harlem's then-Assistant Curator Thomas J. Lax subsequently included both artists' work alongside each other in the 2014 exhibition, When the Stars Begin to Fall: Imagination and the American South.

MICKALENE THOMAS, Still from "Happy Birthday to a Beautiful Woman," 2012, Digital Video, 23 minutes,

Courtesy of Mickalene Thomas and Lehmann Maupin Gallery, New York & Hong Kong

Finally, what can be considered one the most emotionally forceful works of recent times is Mickalene Thomas's heartbreaking documentary, Happy Birthday to a Beautiful Woman (2012), a portrait of her mother made prior to her passing that same year, and which represents a final collaboration with her first and most important muse. Mickalene's mother, Sandra Bush, was an early subject of her work, as she recounts, "I started working with my mother for a photography class at Yale. She'd been a professional model when I was young (in the late 70s and early 80s)—she was absolutely gorgeous, 6' 1', full of energy, and the only person I could convince to pose completely nude for me." The longstanding influence and working together "served as a way for me to understand how they relate to me and my own femininity."

Earlier works such as Lounging, Standing, Looking (2003) and Madame Mama Bush in Black and White (2007) attest to some of the qualities in Sandra that Thomas “always admired and wanted to emulate,” like “her glamour.” In the film, though, as we become aware of the subject’s frailty, her body continuing to shut down in front of the audience, there emerges a clear portrait of “her strength and tenacity, and her sustained elegance and charisma in the face of obstacles.” On one side of the camera, Thomas “thought of the film as a painting,” explaining that she “was thinking about the lens moving like a brushstroke, painting a portrait through a character’s voice and story,” and “[...] about the complexities, composition, formal aspects of color, shape, space, depth of field, rhythm, texture, and all the things you consider when you’re making a painting.” On the other side, Sandra speaks to the camera and directly to Mickalene in her own voice about her feelings of accomplishment and fears, rounding out a persona from the represented muse. Thomas frames the distinction of this work by explaining, “Art from the late 19th and early 20th century is of particular interest [...] because it marks the time when female models started to assert their own identities and presence through the gaze. Around this time, at least in the contemporary discourse, the sitters for the classic genre nude ceased to be anonymous props and began to insist on their individuality with their gaze.”

These three artists successfully use new mediums and in-depth collaboration with their mothers to highlight a fresh perspective on this personal relationship, the results of which are some of the most interesting interpretations of mother and child in contemporary art. They are compelling works not only because of the complicated and loved figures that have had outsized influences on the artists’ lives, but also because as an audience, we have been allowed to enter three unique, longstanding dialogs of mutual respect and growth together.

IN CONVERSATION

HANK WILLIS THOMAS with Allie Biswas

Hank Willis Thomas has spent the last 10 years using the history of advertising as a primary reference. Working directly with print adverts, the artist uses his technique of “unbranding”—where every trace of advertising information is erased, leaving only the original image—to challenge perceptions of identity, commodity, and representation. Thomas’s fifth solo exhibition with Jack Shainman Gallery, Unbranded: A Century of White Women, 1915–2015, on view through May 23, 2015, occupies the gallery’s two spaces. This new body of work continues to explore Thomas’s interest in how we respond to commercial images that have been emptied of their original function, and removed from their intended context.

Allie Biswas (Rail): Adverts have formed a central role in your work. Where did this interest come from, and at what point in your life did you begin to recognize the implications of this kind of imagery?

Hank Willis Thomas: I would say I first became interested in ads as a very, very young child, as almost all of us are. Those of us who grew up in the ’70s, ’80s, and ’90s are probably more influenced and hyper-aware of advertising than previous generations. So I guess I would say that as far back as I can remember I appreciated advertising as a language, and as a brilliant medium for exposing and sharing ideas.

Rail: When did the process of examining adverts in depth begin? Was it when you were studying art at college?

Thomas: Yes, basically as a student. Probably part of my ambition was to become an advertising photographer. I studied photography at NYU and some of the first jobs I did were assisting advertising photographers and commercial photographers. Also, when I graduated I worked at Saturday Night Live's film unit where they sometimes made these fake commercials. I did an internship with The Chris Rock Show, where they also did that. But in the earlier jobs, I was assisting on adverts for Victoria's Secret, DKNY, and Tommy Hilfiger. Being part of the crew, you see a different side of things. I recall realizing how much work was being done to make something seem normal or trivial. That fascinated me.

Portrait of the artist. Pencil on paper by Phong Bui. From a photo by Taylor Dafoe.

Rail: When you were working as part of these advertising teams, would you say that you were looking at what they were producing as an outsider? Were you critical in your perspective?

Thomas: Unless you've got a camera in your hand, or you're in front of the camera, you can't help but look around and think about all of the coordination, all the people that are coming together to make this thing. Most of what you are doing is about setting something up, or about dressing it up.

Rail: What about more specifically in relation to the conceptual aspect of the adverts? The way that you approach adverts now within your work is distinctly political. You manipulate them to make a statement or raise a question, for example. Were you applying that way of thinking to these adverts? Were you looking at an advert for DKNY and thinking, who is this for and what are the problems with it?

Thomas: All I was really thinking was, wow, there are 20 people in this room, and it's all just to make two people look like they are relaxing in bed. It was more the practical side of things. Why was there so much effort going into making something seem—you know, there are these two models who are already presumably beautiful, right? All that kind of pomp and circumstance, and organization and staff—the setup for an advert to show a couple in bed in their underwear. So I think that was just fascinating to me, to see all that goes into making Laetitia Casta or Heidi Klum or Adriana Lima seem beautiful.

Hank Willis Thomas, "Come out of the Bone Age, darling..." (1955/2015). Digital chromogenic print, 40 × 41 7/16". Courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York.

Rail: You were still thinking critically about photography, though.

Thomas: Yes, I was thinking critically about photography at that time, how there is as much going on outside of the frame of the camera as there is in the frame of a photograph. That is what a lot of my work was like when I was at college. I was just hyper-aware of things around me. Having those other jobs at SNL and The Chris Rock Show helped, where the adverts were still commercial, but were making fun of that form of commerce. I think doing all of that stuff at the same time probably was what helped me to formulate my thoughts and approaches. I've also since then shot ads myself, worked for friends on ads, and been in ads. It's kind of a crazy world.

Rail: When did you have these jobs?

Thomas: It was for a couple of years. From '98 to 2000.

Rail: Banded was your first major work. Did you make this directly after finishing college?

Thomas: That was around 2003 to 2004. In my mind there was no relation, ironically.

Rail: So there was a small gap between working for these commercial companies and making your first important photographs that employed an advertising style and the technique of appropriation. What happened during this transitional phrase? How did you arrive at Banded?

Thomas: I was in graduate school, and I was reading a book called Michael Jordan and the New Global Capitalism (1999). It talked about how Nike went from being a $10 million company when he signed, to being a $10 billion company 20 years later, and how all of these industries expanded their ability to market Michael Jordan. I was thinking about black bodies. Bodies like his would have been traded on a market at a different period in time. Now when these bodies are traded today I was thinking about how much money is made from them. So we go from slaves being branded as a sign of ownership, to black bodies today being branded as a way to make money. These were the things that I was thinking about and reading about.

Rail: That was your real impetus, then, to go and make your own photographs.

Thomas: Yeah. I started thinking about logos as our generation's hieroglyphs, and how they can be imbedded with so much meaning, and I really wanted to play off of that.

Rail: What do you think logos mean at this point in time? Has their role changed as such?

Thomas: I think the graphic logos that became so popular are somewhat less popular now. Logos are also just more integrated into our lives. Nike is no longer an apparel company. It is a computer company, and a software company, and a lifestyle company. When I open up my phone, it is already branded, and so I'm branded from the moment I wake up every morning. Then I open the apps, and I'm using corporations as a portal to actually interact with other people. So I think, in a certain way, our lives have become more intertwined with logos, and the language of advertising has become intimately engaged in popular culture.

Rail: You have appropriated the Nike swoosh as a scar on a male body ("Branded Head" [2003], and "Scarred Chest" [2004]), and it is also shown on the clothing of athletes you have photographed (“Basketball & Chain” [2003], and “Football and Chain” [2012]). I wonder if, particularly in those earlier works, the logo was at its strongest, in visual terms. Has the potency of the swoosh even decreased?

Thomas: Well, Michael Jordan isn’t playing any more. [Laughter.] There is just so much more to compete with now because of the explosion of the Internet. You can now sell the same products without having to put the brand onto somebody in a big way. You can just put a couple of colors together and you’ll basically trigger an idea or an image that’s related to a corporate brand. Almost all of us walk around advertising. You’re advertising right now.

Rail:
That’s
true.

Hank Willis Thomas, “The common enemy” (1941/2015). Digital chromogenic print, 51 13/16 × 40”. Courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York.

Hank Willis Thomas, “Bounce back to normal” (1933/2015). Digital chromogenic print, 44 9/16 × 40”. Courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York.

Thomas: And I noticed your watch.

Rail: This is old.

Thomas: It’s an advertisement though. It just may be more subtle. You said, “This is old.” That’s pretty good. [Laughs.] “This isn’t an ad, this is old.”

Rail: Would you say that you are—either consciously or unconsciously—looking out for what people are “advertising” through their clothing and so on?

Thomas: Yes. But maybe I do it subconsciously, particularly when we are talking about this project or any of my related work.

Rail: The next series you made was Unbranded: Reflections in Black by Corporate America 1968–2008. This was the first time that you had solely used adverts—already established images—to generate a body of work.

Thomas: Yes. At that time someone gave me an advert, because they had seen B@anded. They told me that I should do something with it.

Rail: What was the advert?

Thomas: They gave me an ad for a Toyota Rav4. I'll show it to you actually. It's funny how somebody can just give you something and it changes your life forever.

Rail: So they showed you something that then instigated a strong response?

Thomas: I think it's more that I was making work that was about branding and logos, and things like that, and they gave me this ad and I just thought, what can be done with this? After looking at it for three or four years, I started to realize that the last thing you would think this ad was selling was a Japanese car. Then around the same time I saw this ad (50 Cent in a Reebok advert from 2005) that was all over New York. I was shocked because—what do you see this as an ad for?

Rail: 50 Cent.

Thomas: But what's for sale? What is the product?

Rail: I wouldn't be able to decipher what they're trying to sell.

Thomas: Do you know who the "they" is?

Rail: Reebok.

Thomas: You got that much—because it shows a RBK logo. You see three letters as part of a logo, and that's all that tells you it's a Reebok ad. 50 Cent is actually wearing a G-Unit shirt—he's not even wearing the Reebok product!

Rail: He's not even wearing the Reebok product in the Reebok ad.

Thomas: I thought it was amazing that we'd reached a point where you can actually sell a product without the product in it, or without someone that is even related to the product, or an idea that is related to the product. So I went online to see what else was being produced. The Reebok series included Yao Ming. He's shown as a monkey on a basketball. Jay-Z is shown referring to his past as a drug dealer. They have Allen Iverson as the devil. First of all you wonder why the first iteration of this campaign has so many black men, because they're like five percent of the country's population.

With Yao Ming you have the Chinese giant—he’s about seven feet tall—so they clearly had no idea what to do with that. So let’s just throw everything “oriental” into the image—the rising sun, yin-yang. Reebok was like, we got this! It is crazy that nothing here makes sense. This is what made me start to think about what happens when you look at real ads and you remove the advertising information—the text, the logo. Would you be able to guess what is for sale, and, if you could, it’s probably because of a signifier. So I started this project, Unbranded: Reflections in Black by Corporate America 1968–2008, where I’d take an ad and remove all the advertising information. Then I always like to ask people what’s for sale. What’s this ad for?

Rail: What is your methodology for researching and selecting adverts?

Thomas: I just try to find as many ads as possible. With Unbranded I chose 1968 as the start date of the timeframe because it was symbolic of the civil rights movement, the year Martin Luther King Jr. and Robert Kennedy were killed. I ended at 2008 simply because it was 40 years later, but then the series ended up being bookended by the election of Barack Obama.

Rail: How did Unbranded help you to develop your practice?

Thomas: I think it made me realize that there were things that I couldn’t tell in my own images, and that as much as advertising was a great language for me to use, and with which to make statements, it was still limited. What’s interesting to me about adverts as a material is that there are so many voices embedded in the advertisement.

Rail: What about the role of digital manipulation? Your method of altering photographs has been described as “unbranding.” What does the removal of text and logo initiate?

Thomas: It encourages inquisitiveness. It encourages us to really question and evaluate values. What are the things we care about? What are the messages we are trying to articulate? The logo and copywriting distracts you from the real message, which is often more nefarious than we might think. What I love about “unbranding” is that it opens up a conversation on a huge level about what it is that we really care about. Why is this important? How did this become normal? Because presumably, when something has made it to the level of mass media, it has been vetted for public consumption.

Rail: How much are you purposefully aiming for your work to contain a political element?

Hank Willis Thomas, “Priceless #1” (2004). Lambda photograph, dimensions variable. Courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York.

Thomas: It depends on the work. If we take this sculpture behind us (“Lives of Others” [2014])—it’s based on a photograph of someone standing on top of the Berlin Wall touching someone on the ground when the wall came down. These disembodied arms are a cropped moment—this is similar to how I think about cropping a photograph. I like the idea of referring to what has been left out of any photograph, or any historical document. It is not the whole. It’s what has been prepared and presented, or what has been deemed worth saving, or exhibiting. So I try to point that out in my work, even when I talk about historical things. I think one of the reasons I chose to do more “unbranded” work after Branded was because it was harder for me to find specific things that would stand the test of time, as far as I could make comments using logos. Whereas with Unbranded it isn’t even me making the comment—I’m just finding things that are already there, and I’m revealing what lies underneath.

Rail: You talked about the impact that Walter LaFeber’s book on capitalism made on you early on. Were there any texts that were influential when you were making Unbranded?

Thomas: Harvey Young has been influential—his book —Embodying Black Experience. I was interested by how the black body functioned as a political landscape. The bodies that were measured and counted and policed, primarily in the 19th century and early 20th century, through slavery—those same bodies were overcoming certain oppressive forces through the agency they demanded in sports and entertainment, although a lot of the history came with it. Roland Barthes’s books Mythologies and Image Music Text and Empire of Signs are important to me. He writes about the images that we consume, through advertising, and how they become integrated into our way of understanding ourselves. Especially in Image Music Text where he deconstructs the advertisement.

Rail: The spaghetti advert is a good example.

Thomas: Exactly, Panzani. So that really had me thinking about what would happen if I literally, visually, did that.

Rail: So literary or cultural texts have often been a significant factor in instigating or developing an idea?

Thomas: Yes. Or, like I said, someone will just give me something and I’ll save it. I’ve been called a packrat before.

Rail: Let’s talk about your current exhibition at Jack Shainman. You’ve taken 100 adverts produced between 1915 and 2015, and “unbranded” them. I’m interested in the way this series deals specifically with how white female identity has been represented, and how “femininity” has been constructed over the past century.

Thomas: I think one of the things I’ve come to understand and accept is that it’s all mythology, right? We've become more accustomed to acknowledging racism, but we also need to recognize gender, as we know it, in mythology. But this series is like Unbranded, as in, that wasn't about black men, per se, it was about people. This project just allowed me to explore another side of what I feel is the same coin. One of the pieces that really stuck out to me was this advert from 1979, which is part of Unbranded ("So Glad We Made It" [2006]). What is this for?

Rail: McDonald's.

Thomas: And what things do you see happening in this ad?

Rail: Social interaction?

Thomas: Yes. But what are the men doing?

Rail: They're playing backgammon.

Thomas: And what are the women doing?

Rail: Cooing over them.

Thomas: Right. And then you look at the woman on the left.

Rail: She's feeding the man, literally. Placing a burger near to his mouth.

Thomas: And then you look at the guy, and what is positioned immediately next to his right hand? A burger!

Rail: A burger that he can't pick up himself, because he's too busy playing backgammon. So it's naturally the woman's duty to feed him and make sure he is comfortable as he sweats it out over backgammon.

Thomas: So bizarre! They are supposed to be middle-class black people. So they're doing something that middle class people do, but it is the men who are playing and the women are only allowed to watch them. And she has to feed him a burger, even though he has his own burger. This is another advert, which is in the current show ("The Results Are Obvious" [1925/2015]). Here is the original advert.

Rail: It says "Where Do Crows Feet Come From?"

Thomas: The product is for eye health—correcting your eyesight. So they are suggesting that crows feet are a result from having bad eyesight, and that might motivate women to have their eyes tested. I noticed that we get to this point after the Depression where there is this period of luxury. Here is another advert that is in the exhibition ("Wipe away the years"[1932/2015]). This is the original version.

Hank Willis Thomas, "There ain't nothin' I can do nor nothin' I can say" (1924/2015). Digital chromogenic print, 40 3/8 x 40". Courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York.

Hank Willis Thomas, "Smokin' Joe Ain't J'Mama" (1978/2006). LightJet print, dimensions variable. Courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York.

Rail: It's amazing how much text there is on this one, a couple of paragraphs in really small font.

Thomas: Did you read it? It's an advert for floor polish, and they are marketing it as a beauty treatment. As a white woman, you weren't supposed to do your own housework. Or, at the very least, you weren't supposed to be seen to be doing your own cleaning. I just think this is the most brilliant ad ever. How do we get these women to buy our cleaning product? What if we constructed it as a beauty treatment?

Rail: It is very seductive, though.

Thomas: Yeah, at the same time it is. During the 1930s they started to catch their stride and they became much more clever with it. It makes great moments like this. Here is an ad for sweaters from 1959 ("She's somewhat of a drag" [1959/2015]).

Rail: The woman is literally hanging on for her life, whilst the two men casually watch from the top of the cliff.

Thomas: This, to me, is like, if you want freedom, this is how we're going to give it to you. You know, this is at the same time that people of African descent are being killed for looking at a white woman in the wrong way. And we find an image here of white men essentially brutalizing a woman.

Rail: Was there any particular incentive to make this series right now?

Thomas: Well, we're at the beginning of an American electoral cycle and all the big news is about Hillary Clinton. We might be electing our first female president. Considering that women in this country didn't have the right to vote a hundred years ago, I thought it was interesting to consider what happened in advertisements as a way to track societal notions of a specific gender—how it belongs and what its role should be in our society. I wanted to take advertisements and go through the century, using one ad for every year to create an actual timeline.

Rail: What criteria did you use for the final selection?

Thomas: I don't know if there was a full logic. I tried not to use ads that were high fashion ads because those tend to be—they need to be kind of provocative. I wanted to find ads that spoke to the general spirit of the times, or things that were happening historically.

Rail: Where do the adverts originate from, in particular the older ones?

Thomas: I found them mostly in books and in magazines, and through archives.

Rail: I enjoyed seeing the transformation of the medium. The adverts start out as what look like watercolors—they are very obviously paintings and drawings—and then we see the transition to photography.

Thomas: Magazine advertising was really just beginning at the start of the 20th century. Now it's coming to be a century old and possibly on its way out.

Rail: As the images are organized using this chronological device, one of the first things that you're thinking is, does the story change? Is the advert from 2015 essentially advocating the same message as the advert from 1915? Was it an intention of yours to make viewers ask this type of question?

Thomas: My intentions are to reveal what I found. These are all, for the most part, mainstream ads. They're mostly mainstream messages that are aimed at women, to kids, to guys. And if these are the people who are considered to be the most valuable in our cultures—as far as the standard of beauty and virtue goes, often based around these kinds of notions of white female integrity—well, this is how they're treated. So how does that relate to the rest of us? I think it's fascinating to consider. As the white female body works and fights for its own sense of agency and independence, there's a whole lot of work that seems to be done to prohibit and—

Rail: To undo all of that progress.

Hank Willis Thomas, "Behind every great man..." (1973/2015). Digital chromogenic print, 38 5/8 × 50". Courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York.

Thomas: Yes. I'm really eager to hear what people have to say about it. This is just my own opinion. Some people have liked the images in my work for different reasons and that's also an issue. When you see images that, say, to me, feel very sexist—having my name on them, some people will think that I made them. I'm like, no, we made them. I didn't make them. We, as a society, made them.

Rail: I had the opportunity to view the original adverts alongside your re-worked versions. Did you ever consider showing the originals in the exhibition?

Thomas: I did consider this, but I want people to really think about the images we are producing. The originals are a distraction from what is really for sale.

Rail: Do you ever think about the ethical implications of your work? Do you feel any sort of responsibility, in that sense?

Thomas: I think there are all kinds of ethical implications. I mean, who owns the images? I don't know. Clearly they aren't, technically, mine. But I really don't know who owns these images. What gives someone the right to own an image that's made for public consumption? It's really delicate, so I think the whole project is rife with ethical questions. Does re-showing or re-presenting these adverts reiterate meanings? Is there another way to talk about this stuff without presenting them in this way?

Rail: I wonder, then, how it felt to show your work in Bench Marks, which was your first public art project, carried out last year. Your photographs were inserted into the fabrication of benches situated at bus stops, on the street, in a neighborhood of Chicago. When your appropriated adverts were positioned onto a public bench, they became used almost as an advert in their own right. Do you agree with that?

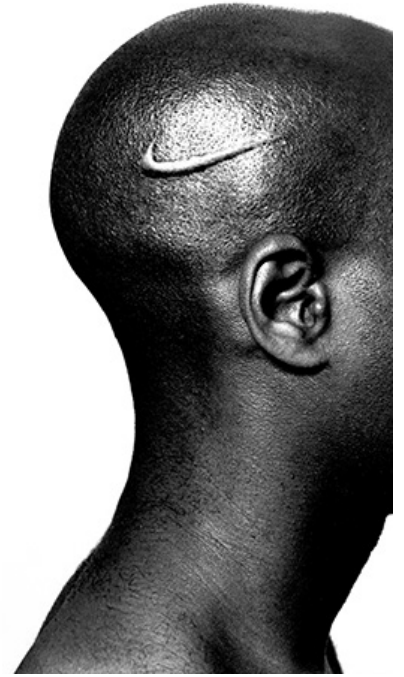

Thomas: Yeah, there was no direction with them. I think it's important when you make work that is about media and popular culture to put it outside. Whenever you have an opportunity to put it out into the public, it really speaks differently than when it is shown in a gallery. It's harder to get feedback. People vandalize it and you learn different things, but I realize, in that situation, you just don't know who's seeing it and you don't know how they're interpreting it. I don't have any control. Also, I think it's important in our culture to have images out there that aren't a call to action. They're not commerce-related images. They are in the same vein, but they are not saying, go and buy this product, or do this, or do that. I love that kind of usage of public space.

Rail: How about the way in which you are represented as an artist in the public sphere? Is that something you feel you have control of? You were recently included in two group exhibitions: Speaking of People: Ebony, Jet and Contemporary Art at The Studio Museum, and the travelling show 30 Americans organized by the Rubell Collection. Did you consider how your identity would be viewed within these curatorial premises, for example?

Thomas: Well I think 30 Americans is called that instead of 30 African Americans because they were trying to posit it as a show that's about America, even though 99% of the artists in that show are African American. You could argue, obviously, when you learn that the exhibition is mostly of African American artists, many of whom are dealing with themes about American history, that it is related to that subject. You might consider that as the exhibition's theme. But it's a little bit of a sleight of hand. I think that's what happens in that kind of case.

Rail: You don't really have a say in how you're defined, then.

Thomas: You never do. Once you make work, and put it out there, you have very little say. I could say all I want, but people can do whatever they want with the work, if they have access to it and I don't. I think it's important to be seen in a multitude of contexts. Some people have issues with that, but I guess I grew up in a particular setting. My mother is a curator, she worked at the African American Museum Project and Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture. So, I don't know. If I were only presented in one way or another, I probably would have a bigger issue. But, having had my work presented in various contexts, I think I'm just happy that people want to show and see the work.

Hank Willis Thomas, "Branded Head" (2003). Lambda photograph, dimensions variable. Courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York.

CONTRIBUTOR

Allie Biswas

ALLIE BISWAS writes on the arts and is based in London. Recent features include interviews with Cecily Brown and Zhang Enli and a profile of Piero Fornasetti.

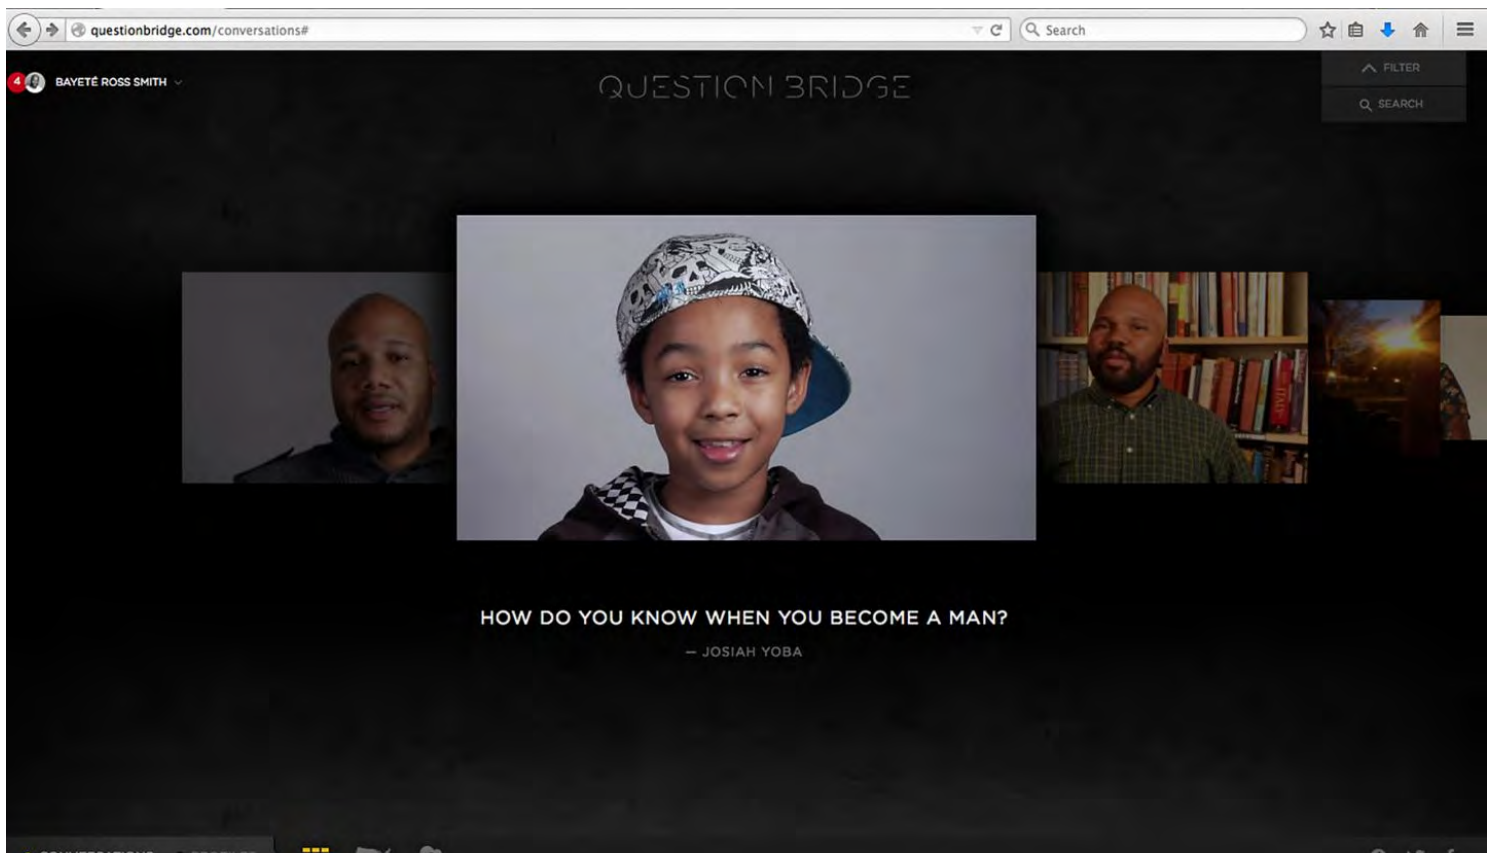

INTERVIEW WITH HANK WILLIS THOMAS FOR QUESTION BRIDGE

ICP Curator Pauline Vermare Talks to the 2015 Infinity Awards Recipient for New Media

INTERVIEW

Apr 30, 2015

What inspired your turn to photography?

I came to photography through my mother, Deborah Willis, and I really think it is almost through osmosis that I became a photographer, because pictures and cameras and darkrooms were everywhere when I was growing up.

How did Question Bridge come about?

The idea of Question Bridge as a project came from my collaborator Chris Johnson, who realized that video could be used as a way to facilitate a conversation between people in communities that don't talk about certain issues very well. Question Bridge: Black Males is a way to talk about there being as much diversity within any demographic as there is outside of it. Asking African American men—or people who identify as African American men—to ask and answer each other's questions, we realized that they're actually very different people, and that each person is an individual, and that starts to call into question the necessity of defining people based on narrow group identity, or demographic identities.

Question Bridge* is a brilliant art installation as well as an amazingly important social project. How was it received?

We premiered it in five places at once, including the Brooklyn Museum and the Sundance Film Festival. We've now traveled the show to more than 38 venues around the country, and also done about 50 screenings of it, so it's been extremely well received, as an art installation, curriculum, website, etc. And we've had over half a million people interacting with the project to date. The fact that it's transmedia, that it doesn't just exist in one or two forms but actually exists in five forms, means that people can approach it from a variety of perspectives and spend different kinds of time with it. That's what we love.

Was social media an important tool for the project?

Yes, more and more recently, after we launched the website. We were able to use social media as a way to engage people in the conversation, and it's been really exciting to see the response that people have and also having people log on and create their own identity profiles and Question Bridges.

What is the future of Question Bridge?

We shall see. One idea is to build other Question Bridges that aren't race or gender specific, so that people can make a Question Bridge about whatever communities they see themselves being part of.

A few words about ICP?

I've been going to ICP since my childhood, since it was on Fifth Avenue uptown, and I have maintained relationships with the staff, especially our dear Lacy Austin—so many wonderful staff and curators—and I've even had the opportunity to be a visiting professor at ICP. As I've traveled around the country and also around the world, I have so many friends who are amazing photographers, whose entry into the photography world was through taking classes at ICP. And so I see ICP not only as an exhibition space but as an education space, an outreach in creative thinking kind of resource in the city for photography. It's been extraordinarily important and essential. And not to mention that my mother's won the Infinity Award and I got to be there when she won it, and it was really exciting (Infinity Award for Writing, 1995). I never thought that I would receive such an award.

Question Bridge: Black Males was created by Chris Johnson, Hank Willis Thomas, Bayeté Ross Smith and Kamal Sinclair. The Executive Producers are Delroy Lindo, Deborah Willis and Jesse Williams.

SHARE

Hank Willis Thomas looks back on 100 years of white women

April 16, 2015

7:14 AM MST

Courtesy of Hank Willis Thomas and the Jack Shainman Gallery

The Jack Shainman Gallery in Chelsea is currently presenting a collection of work by Hank Willis Thomas for the exhibition Unbranded: A Century of White Women, 1915—2015. For his fifth solo show at the gallery, Thomas unveils 101 photographs relating to different generations of white women and how they've portrayed in popular culture over the past century. Thomas chooses images that represent each individual year between 1915 and 2015 where explores notions of virtue, power, beauty, privilege, and desire that many of these women possess.

One of the earliest images in this show No Anxious Moments (1918) perfectly captures the charm of mother and child bonding as it illustrates a woman in her kitchen kneeling down in front of her oven to take out a tray of muffins as her young daughter stands next to her beaming with her rosy cheeks and wearing a long apron. The girl very much resembles the iconic Little Debbie, the namesake of brand of desserts whose products include cupcakes and brownies. Similarly, Give Your Daughter a Daughter (1971) also highlights notions family bonding as it depicts three generations of women. A woman sits in a large wicker chair as her young daughter with pigtail braids sits on her lap as a baby doll with curly blonde hair, blue eyes, and wearing a light pink dress sits on the child's lap.

Another theme that's examined in the show is that of women being allowed to embrace their sexuality. The Taming of the Shrewd (1966) symbolizes the suppression of desires features a beautiful blonde woman wearing a leopard skin swimsuit trapped inside a cage in a jungle as though she were an actual live animal being locked up as her male companion leans his back against the cage and looking over his shoulder in amusement. On the other hand, The Natives Will Get Restless (1976) depicts a woman swinging on a rope in the jungle, wearing a bikini, as though she's finally breaking free from societal constraints.

The most recent image in the show Just As Our Forefathers Intended, (2015) pays homage to Emanuel Gottlieb Leutze's iconic Washington Crossing the Delaware painting with two groups of women standing on a wooden board in the place of George Washington's army as they make their journey across the Delaware River. The first group of women are standing in front of a red flatbed truck pulling another group of women piled onto a boat.

At the Jack Shainman Gallery, 524 W. 24th St., and 513 W. 20th St., through May 23. The gallery is open Tuesdays through Saturdays from 10 a.m. until 6 p.m.

SUGGESTED LINKS

- Philemona Williamson explores adventures of adolescence at Soho gallery show
- Rose Wylie's perceptions of people and animals at Chelsea gallery show
- Alma Thomas' Earthly drawings and paintings on view at Chelsea gallery
- Dena Schutzer illustrates 'Local Encounters' at Chelsea gallery show
- Aaron Johnson's sock paintings on view in East Harlem

Alison Martin
NY Fine Arts Examiner

Hank Willis Thomas Recalls the Past Century

A new exhibition looks at the last hundred years of white women in print advertising.

April 13, 2015 7:36 PM | by Antwaun Sargent

Hank Willis Thomas, 2005. Courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York

As Hillary Clinton gears up for her second run for the presidency, artist Hank Willis Thomas new photo series, Unbranded: A Century of White Women, 1915-2015, explores how popular images of women's roles have changed over the last century. "As I started to think about what's happening now leading up to the election, I thought a lot about the conversation surrounding Hilary Clinton, and the idea that we might have our first woman President, " he said the other day at the Jack Shainman Gallery in Chelsea. "I wanted to look at how perceptions of women's roles and 'whiteness' have changed over the last century."

Building on ideas first tackled in his fascinating project, Unbranded: Reflections in Black by Corporate America 1968-2008, Thomas's new show examines how race, class, and sexuality has evolved in mainstream America. Starting with a 1915 cream of wheat ad that shows two white women being served by a black man, Thomas removes the original ad copy to “unbrand” it and remove it from its original context. In this way, his images reveal their not-so-hidden messages. Touching on gender roles, notions of beauty and desire, Thomas selected only one quintessential advertisement for each year between 1915 and 2015. “None of us fit into the definition of our demographic,” said Thomas. “By looking at this specific demographic a story emerges about how our society values have changed,” he explains. An ad for Drummond sweaters shows a man dangling a woman by a rope off the side of a mountain as he warmly chats up another young man; in another ad from the film Mr. Mom, a woman heads off to work in a suit as her male partner stays at home with the kids. “But you have to wonder how far have we really come.” He was standing in front of the famed Sex and the City ad of a nude Sarah Jessica Parker but nowhere was there a reference to the TV show. Thomas had retitled it, When I’m good, I’m very good, but when I’m bad, I’m better, 1998/2015. “We don’t want to deal with the reality,” he said. “We only want the fantasy.”

Unbranded: A Century of White Women, 1915 – 2015 is on view at the Jack Shainman Gallery’s two outposts in Chelsea through May 23.

The New York Times

ART IN REVIEW

Hank Willis Thomas

Courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, New York

A five-channel video presentation of a work in process, “Question Bridge: Black Males.”

By HOLLAND COTTER

Published: August 1, 2013

*Jack Shainman Gallery
524 West 24th Street, Chelsea
Through Aug. 23*

This show includes some recent sculptures and photographic pieces by an artist who has consistently made the pathologies of racism his subject. And he has been particularly astute in examining the workings of what W. E. B. Du Bois called double consciousness, the condition in which people see themselves reflected, often negatively, in the view of others and end up molding their lives to confirm that view.

The phenomenon is repeatedly addressed in the show's most significant piece, the five-channel video installation "Question Bridge: Black Males," made up of deftly edited and interwoven interviews with some 150 African-American men. Students, retirees, businessmen, teachers, prison inmates and artists, the speakers grapple, optimistically and pessimistically, with questions about why racism in America exists, whether it can be changed and, whether it can or can't, how they can change themselves.

There are wonderful voices and a lot of wisdom this project, which was created by Mr. Thomas and three collaborators, Chris Johnson, Bayeté Ross Smith and Kamal Sinclair. It is currently showing in museums, galleries and schools across the country and is a work in progress. An interactive online version, questionbridge.com, is scheduled to appear in January; whoever signs up can contribute an interview, join the conversation. The semi-wraparound gallery presentation is a more passive experience. But the material is so compelling, and so much of the moment, that you feel pulled in and part of what's going on.

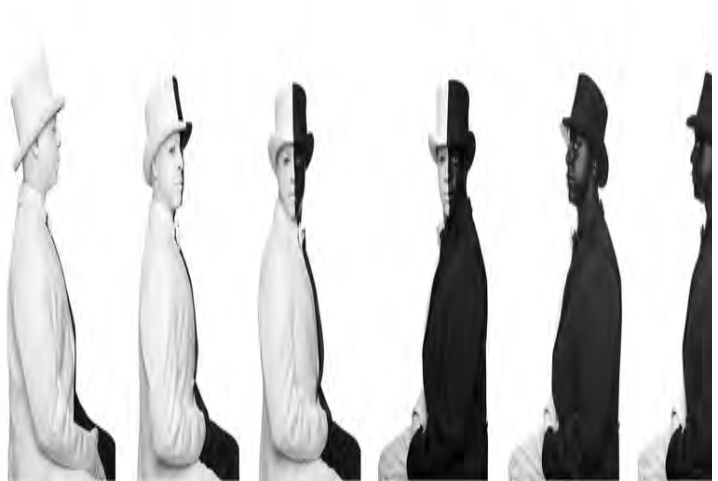

A version of this review appeared in print on August 2, 2013, on page C25 of the New York edition with the headline: Hank Willis Thomas.

ARTSY

Hank Willis Thomas on Photo-manipulation, Instagram, and Hybrid Identities

ARTSY EDITORIAL

APR 8TH, 2013 2:42 PM

Hank Willis Thomas
Zero Hour (from Wayfarer series)
Goodman Gallery

Hank Willis Thomas unabashedly points his camera toward issues of identity, race, and class. In this candid interview, he discusses a range of topics relating to his practice, from voyeurism and Instagram to photo-manipulation, stereotypes, and hybrid identities.

Artsy: When, and why, did you first pick up a camera?

Hank Willis Thomas: My mother, Deborah Willis, is a photographer, photo-historian, author, and educator. Cameras have been part of my life since I can remember.

Artsy: You use photography to raise questions on violence, race, class, and identity. How is the medium conducive to presenting these issues in such a powerful way?

HWT: In the United States, every photograph of a person speaks to issues of race, class, and identity. My fine art photography is simply less misleading about its intentions. Photography has influenced, manipulated, and distorted most of our relationships to reality, history, the representation of others, as well as ourselves. We passively accept most things we see in photographs as evidence or “truth”.

I use photography to approach these issues because I already know that the public's eye is trained to subconsciously imbibe images on a massive scale. For this reason, it is the perfect medium by which to problematize these things in order to inspire dialogue. And then there is Instagram, which just makes me feel like my life is more interesting than it is every time I get a “like” from a stranger. It’s kind of weird how voyeurism and exhibitionism have become married in such an explicit less shameful way in recent years.

Artsy: A lot of your work addresses the way pop culture propagates certain stereotypes. How can we move beyond these paradigms?

HWT: I personally believe that as long as we believe in race, we are racists. It may seem provocative since the idea of race has very real consequences for so many of us. We try to pretend racists are devils while ignoring the societal and institutional foundations of racism. But at the end of the day, like most things, it’s just a figment of our imagination. That became so much clearer to me as I’ve traveled around the world, especially in Africa, Asia, and Europe. Race was created by western Europeans to explicitly perpetuate their dominance over other peoples and cultures. It’s worked like a charm in the U.S. especially. But times are a-changin’. I believe we can start to challenge these paradigms by becoming more active lookers. Historical consciousness, flexible thinking and visual literacy are key. When we start to view images as text, we can start to see the kind of visual coding taking place. All images are messages. We just need to become active in the discourse rather than simply being receptors or consumers of images, which is how the public is trained by popular culture media. Did you ever watch this speech by Walter Mosley? (see video) Artsy: You recently photographed Sanford Biggers in half black, half white makeup. Can you talk about the concept behind this project, as well as your decision to shoot the images personally?

HWT: There is so much to that piece, it’s hard to summarize and make sense. First, I am most known for manipulating photographs, but my training is as a photographer. I’ve always kept this as part of my practice. The idea for the “Wayfarer Series” comes from an archival image I found while doing photo research. It spoke to the idea of hybridity and double-consciousness. Sanford has explored this in his work for years and I felt like that collaboration with him would allow me to ponder these ideas on a different level. Today, nearly everyone is a cultural hybrid. We can't just look at skin color to tell us very much about their beliefs, values, and traditions. I love collaboration because it gives me a chance to think bigger and in more complex ways about everything. On some level, all of my work is about framing and context. How and where we are standing, who is "holding" the frame affects how we perceive the world.

Artsy: What are you up to next?

HWT: I've got a lot of things coming up! I'm really excited about the range of projects I've been involved in. I just completed at 70 foot video installation called "The Long March" with other members of ©ause Collective at the Shuttlesworth- Birmingham International Airport. I am a co-executive producer on my friend Terence Nance's film An Oversimplification of Her Beauty which is out later this month. My collaborative project Question Bridge: Black Males is continuing to travel the country and we are in development of an interactive website with the support of the California Endowment and Tribeca Film Institute. Natasha Logan and I just curated an exhibition "White Boys" at Haverford College featuring a number of peers I admire. And later this year the Cleveland Museum of Art and Transformer Station in Cleveland are doing a large survey of my work, which will include the traveling of the Truth Booth around the city. I'm very excited to see how all of these projects will evolve. [So are we! Follow Hank on Artsy and Twitter for updates]

Portrait by Alexis Peskine

Special 110th Anniversary Issue

NOVEMBER 2012

ARTnews

Pollock

De Kooning

Joan Mitchell

Hans Hofmann

Paint a Painting

Pat Steir

Diana Al-Hadid

Fred Wilson

Hank Willis
Thomas

Paints a Painting,

Makes a Sculpture,

Creates an Installation,

Stages a Photo Shoot

Artists In Action

Hank Willis

In full costume and make-up, Sanford Biggers balances in a one-footed pose for Hank Willis Thomas. It's the last set-up of a day-long shoot.

Thomas

Stages a Photo Shoot

HOW SANFORD BIGGERS CAME TO STRIKE A POSE AS A TWO-FACED DANDY

By Rachel Wolff

Photos by Rebecca Robertson

It's not always quite this bustling, Hank Willis Thomas tells me as we make our way into his small, fifth-floor studio located in Midtown Manhattan; it's just when he's gearing up for a major project or a show—which, these past few years, has been more or less his perpetual state.

With posters, postcards, fabric samples, and mock-ups pinned haphazardly to the walls, bicycles parked in a corner, and a handful of cluttered workstations (each anchored by an iMac or a MacBook Pro), the tightly packed space could be home to any young, energetic, creative New York start-up. And, in a sense, that's what it is, with Thomas installed as CEO.

Four assistants mill about the room. Some tend to administrative duties (e-mail, scheduling, and the like); others are helping Thomas digitally plot out potential new works (quilts made out of sports jerseys, a mosaic of triangular, glass flag cases filled with brightly colored spices). They're friends or friends of friends for the most part. And, of course, they are artists, working in media ranging from sculpture to graphic design to computer programming to film.

Rachel Wolff is a New York-based critic, writer, and editor.

PHOTOS ©2012 REBECCA ROBERTSON PAGES 112-117

Shane Aslan Selzer steams wrinkles from the custom-made suit (left) and compares shoes with Biggers (center). Thomas and Selzer inspect the costume.

"We're all ethnically different, we come from different places, we have different cultural backgrounds, we have different expertise and different interests," Thomas says. He frequently asks his assistants for their input—what they see, what they like, what they feel, what they think. "It's important to have heard a diverse group of voices," he adds. "Especially when you're making work that is political or about race and gender."

The artist, who trained in photography (first at the Tisch School of the Arts at New York University and then at the California College of the Arts in Oakland, California), has expanded his practice to include text-based pieces, interactive installations, and reworked and repurposed ads. He focuses, for the most part, on the ways in which race and gender are mediated through language, advertising, and popular culture. Thomas's 2005–8 series "Unbranded," for instance, features ads, geared toward African American consumers, stripped of their logos and text so that the corporations' carefully staged vignettes of black life in America are all that remain. His 2001–11 "B^oanded" is a series of composite images that shrewdly connect the commodification of the African American male body today via sports and advertising with that of the slave trade. In one image, a muscle-bound chest is speckled with Nike swoop-shaped scars reminiscent of those left by a whip's lacerations.

Thomas takes me up to the tenth floor, where he has rented an even smaller, second space just for the run-up to his solo exhibition at New York's Jack Shainman Gallery (on view through November 17). The tiny light-filled room contains stacks of vintage Ebony, Essence, and Jet magazines and a vitrine made out of Lumisty, a thick, foggy, Plexiglas-like material used in commercial displays. One assistant is busy executing a series of text paintings based on Civil Rights-era campaign buttons, featuring phrases like "Keep the Faith Baby," "I Am A White Agitator," and "100% Efficiency Man." As for the Lumisty, Thomas likes the effect—the way it blurs, abstracts, and sometimes hides the image or object behind it, depending on the angle from which it is viewed, but he's not yet certain of how best to use the material.

Indeed, at this moment, Thomas is most excited about two printouts pinned to the wall. One is a sepia-hued, full-length portrait of a late-19th-century African American performer, dressed in top hat and tuxedo. The right side of his face, hat, and suit are white, while his left side is presented in black, creating a sharp, vertical line dividing him in two. The original image is part of Emory University's massive holdings of photographs documenting African American life.

A noose and chain are among the day's props (left). Makeup artist Toby Klinger touches up Biggers's black-and-white face paint (center). Lisa Fairstein holds up one of the images that inspired the project. She and Thomas compare it to Biggers's pose (right).

The picture appeals to Thomas for its "kind of dandyism, but also its hybridity," he says. He's interested in the subject's motivation. "We talk about being 'post-racialism' now, but this is somebody who's unknown and dealing with those things in the late 19th century."

The second image is a reasonably well known, albeit somewhat tone-deaf, late-1950s advertisement for Knoll furniture. It depicts a top-hatted, white chimney sweep lounging in a luxe red Eero Saarinen "Womb" chair, resting his ash-covered face on his sooty right hand. Brushes dangle from the fingers on his left hand, and a noose-evoking rope is coiled loosely around his left arm. The ad ran in the anniversary issue of the New Yorker every year from 1957 until 1971.

"It's a little bit about blackface and minstrel-sy," Thomas says. "I couldn't figure out what the context was, except for Mary Poppins, which was out around the same time. But still, there's this thing about white men with black covering them. It's tens of years away from the minstrel era, and it's only slightly different. Race has always been somewhat about class."

Thomas wants to build his own take on the subject by combining the two images, riffing on this idea of racial, cultural, and socioeconomic hybridity, and fleshing out the deceptively complex characters embedded in each. He has enlisted fellow artist Sanford Biggers to collaborate and pose.

"I think Sanford's work has been very much about cultural hybridity," Thomas says. "He has done stuff with B-boys and hip-hop and Buddhism. He's frequently engaged with that, and I thought he could be a kind of lens to talk about these issues."

Biggers quickly got on board. "I think it's an American knee-jerk response to equate black and white with literally blacks and whites. I want to find a way for it to be more nuanced," he says. "And, in fact, I think it did that because this photograph and the character in it become more about duality and a more multifaceted being. It's about the yin and yang, and pathology and moralism, and life and death. And superego. Those types of things. Which are things I've really been exploring in my recent work as well."

A month and several brainstorming sessions later, in early August, the two artists are together on set in a modest photo studio at NYU (Thomas's mother, Deborah Willis, is now the chair of the department of photography and imaging at Tisch) along with a crew of seven gaffers, producers, and assistants. When I get there, Biggers is stealing bites of an egg sandwich between brushstrokes as the makeup artist applies broad swaths of black and white pigment to his face; she keeps the source image of the 19th-century performer firmly in sight.

Thomas shoots with a digital Hasselblad H4, which is connected to a laptop and monitor (left). He and Kambui Olujimi examine the images (right).

The set itself is relatively quiet. Thomas is working with a few members of his production team on a shot list in a nearby classroom while his lead gaffer and camera assistant (close friends and frequent collaborators Kambui Olujimi and Will Sylvester) take test shots against the white paper background and tweak and retweak and retweak the lights.

When his makeup is done, Biggers slips on the rest of his costume: a tuxedo complete with tails, gloves, and a top hat, all bisected down the same line as his face—half-black, half-white—and stitched together by Thomas's friend, pattern-maker Hilary Smith, from goods produced from the Garment District and the Internet. Thomas steps behind the camera, a rented Hasselblad H4, and takes some test shots of his own as Biggers gets a feel for the lighting and the set. "It's pretty weird already," Thomas says. To which Biggers replies, "That's a good sign."

Biggers moves through a series of theatrical and balletic poses as Thomas snaps away. Some mimic the source figure's dandyish posture, others seem drawn from Kabuki theater, Grace Jones, Charlie Chaplin, or Fred Astaire. The makeup artist pops up every so often to touch up Biggers's face, and Thomas's team tugs, tapes, and adjusts his suit between shots to smooth out any bunching or folds.

Thomas gives direction throughout: "Half smile." "Look up proudly to yonder." "Face me a little more." "Turn another few degrees." "Exaggerate your foot position." "Suck in your stomach and puff out your chest." "Let the coat flow a little bit—let's see some wagging of the tail."

The crew orders Thai food for lunch and reconfigures the studio for the second set-up. They've rented the exact same red Saanen "Womb" chair that appears in the Knoll ad, but instead of chimney brushes and a utilitarian rope, Biggers will clutch a noose, a pair of shackles, a chain, two crosses, and a red-and-white Nike Air Jordan sneaker in various combinations. Thomas sets the scene: "You're exhausted. You're in the most comfortable chair, and you're content."

The third and final set-up involves rented backdrops of a marbled facade and tiled terrace that suggest the courtyard or garden of an upscale estate. Thomas opts for natural lighting, asking his crew to strike the blackout shades coating the studio's wall of windows. He takes several close-ups and asks Biggers to hold a series of geometric poses with his leg extended behind him. "You're really good at that," he tells Biggers while reviewing his last shot. "It must be all that yoga."

Using late afternoon sunlight instead of strobes, Thomas took the camera off its tripod to shoot Biggers as he moved fluidly against a faux-marble backdrop (this page). Two final works, digital C-prints from the shoot, both Untitled, 2012 (following spread).

Two weeks later, I'm back at Thomas's studio. Many of the same assistants from the shoot are manning their respective MacBook Pros. Sylvester is working on an animation for the Jack Shainman show that starts as a variation of the black nationalist flag and changes kaleidoscopically in response to the intonation of one's voice. It will be screened with rousing Civil Rights-era rhetoric as voiceover.

Thomas has called in his friend Wyatt Gallery, a photographer, to help him sort through the some 600 shots he snapped of Biggers that day at NYU. He has trimmed the selection in half and spliced together a few stop-motion-style films of Biggers in action. Thomas says he'd like to find a way to use them. At this point, he's still not sure what final form the piece will take, though he's leaning toward an editioned platinum print, which would fit in the context of the original 19th-century shot.

Thomas is pleased with the results, though, as is Biggers, who stopped by a few days later to see the images himself. The two even think this "avatar" could manifest himself in other scenarios, too—a short film, perhaps, with more of a narrative-driven approach.

Thomas has come up with something fairly ingenious by the time we speak the following week. After printing 22 selects (drawn mostly from set-ups one and three), he inserted several of them into lightbox-style frames made from Lumisty—the material I saw in the studio several weeks before. The effect is remarkable. From the front, the portrait of Biggers is crystal clear, yet as one moves around it, the image becomes increasingly blurred, ghostlike, and hardly recognizable as a human being—a fuzzy totem in black, white, and gray.

It is, in that sense, a perfect metaphor for the increasingly blurry lines of race itself. "I've always felt more comfortable in the gray space," Thomas says. "I think it's closer to the truth of any given scenario. And that was some of the challenge with this work itself, being half-black, half-white. With my work in general, I'm very interested in seeing if it works at all and seeing if what I was looking at was valid and then from there getting into a deeper idea."

Strange Fruit: Interview with Hank Willis Thomas

March 23, 2012 | by Ilysha McMillan

Hank Willis Thomas latest body of work Strange Fruit expresses the historical truths blacks had to endure throughout their journey here in the United States. Hank created vivid comparisons of black perception between the pre-slavery era and post-Civil Rights Movement. The irony that drips and oozes from his canvas, visually gives a voice to those in history who didn't have one. Hank's symbolism exposes the role media plays in the down fall of our popular culture. This creative genius shed light on the method behind his madness.

Read writer Ilysha McMillan's conversation with Hank Willis Thomas, exploring images from his recently released Strange Fruit body of work.

“...Popular culture influences the way we as a culture learn and perpetuate stereotypes about ourselves.”

– Hank Willis Thomas

Art Nouveau: Which piece came about first and what triggered you to develop that idea into your newest collection?

Hank Willis Thomas: My work is primarily concerned with popular culture, history, and race in America, and many of the pieces in this show are building on themes found in older work. I created the piece "Hang Time" over a year ago, but had always wanted to photograph more images for the series. The rest of the work is a meditation exploring this issue of African American's complicated history with the noose. The opportunity to create a new body of work around these themes was given to me by the Corcoran Gallery of Art with support from Jack Shainman Gallery.

AN: Was there any research done before or during the making of this collection and if so, what did you spend most time on? Why?

HWT: Much of the inspiration for my work comes from history, and the ways cultural history is told. I spend a lot of time with archival materials, including texts, magazines, and images from the last 100 years. The most important book I referenced was Without Sanctuary.

Art Nouveau: What role do you believe the media plays in bringing to life the symbolism you used throughout your Strange Fruit collection?

HWT: Strange Fruit is a series of works that is questioning how the media represents and portrays black bodies, particularly with regards to their physicality. To me, popular culture influences the way we as a culture learn and perpetuate stereotypes about ourselves.

AN: What influenced you to use the graphics you did for the 4 hanging blacks in the "Martyr" piece?

HWT: Martyr: Lige Daniels, Aug 3, 1920, Center, TX, 2011

Martyr: Laura Nelson, May 25, 1911, Okemah, OK, 2011

Martyr: Unidentified Man, 1925, 2011

Martyr: Clyde Johnson, Aug 3, 1935, Yreka, CA, 2011

The "Martyr" piece includes images from documentation of lynchings that occurred across the southern states of America in the early part of the 20th century. 1940s. The photographs were distributed via postcards and collected as paraphernalia. I wanted to see what would happen if we were to place victims of lynching in the same way we treat martyrs and religious icons. We preserve them in churches windows with stained glass.

AN: What does the noose represent in our current society? What do you believe needs to get accomplished so that we can one day remove the noose from our around our throats?

HWT: I wonder what it means to you. I'm still investigating that myself. In some of the work in Strange Fruit, I was trying to reinterpret the noose—what does it mean when a black man powerfully and easily dunks a basketball through a noose?

AN: What are your views on the reoccurring NFL/NBA lockouts and in what ways do you represent your views in your recent collection?

HWT: I believe the lockout somehow brought about the rise of Jeremy Lin.

just do it.

KEEP WALKING.

By Mira Gandy
Artist & Scribe

NEW YORK ARTS

Hank Willis Thomas — Strange Fruit — and redefining the Black male identity

HANK WILLIS THOMAS was born in Plainfield, New Jersey in 1976. His mother is a photographer and an historian of African American photography and his father is, amongst other things, a jazz musician.

Thomas is a photo conceptual artist working primarily with themes related to identity, history and popular culture. He received his BFA from New York University's Tisch School of the Arts and his MFA in photography, along with an MA in visual criticism, from California College of the Arts (CCA) in San Francisco.

Thomas has acted as a visiting professor at CCA and in the MFA programs at Maryland Institute College of Art and ICP/Bard and has lectured at Yale University, Princeton University, the Birmingham Museum of Art and the Musée du Quai Branly in Paris.

His work has been featured in many publications including Reflections in Black (Norton, 2000) 25 under 25: Up-and-Coming American Photographers (CDS, 2003), 30 Americans (RFC, 2008). Thomas' monograph, Pitch Blackness, was published by Aperture in 2008. He received a new media fellowship through the Tribeca Film Institute and was an artist in residence at John Hopkins University.

He has exhibited in galleries and museums throughout the U.S. and abroad including Galerie Anne De Villepoix in Paris, the Goodman Gallery in Johannesburg, the Studio Museum in Harlem, Yerba Buena Center for the Arts in San Francisco and the Wadsworth Atheneum in Hartford. Thomas' work is in numerous public collections including The Whitney Museum of American Art, the Brooklyn Museum, The High Museum of Art in Atlanta and the Museum of Fine Art in Houston.

His collaborative projects have been featured at the Sundance Film Festival and installed publicly at the Oakland International Airport, The Oakland Museum of California and the University of California, San Francisco. Recent exhibitions include Dress Codes: The International Center for Photography's Triennial of Photography and Video, Greater New York at P.S. 1/ MoMa, Contact Toronto Photography Festival and Houston Fotofest. Thomas is represented by Jack Shainman Gallery in New York City.

Recently, I caught up with the iconic artist in D.C. to discuss his photographic exhibition Strange Fruit on view at

Hank Willis Thomas, And One, 2011

Corcoran Gallery of Art and his innovative trans media project Question Bridge.

MIRA GANDY: What was the impetus for your Strange Fruit series?

HANK WILLIS THOMAS: I am interested in archival imagery and what other stories photographic images tell. How can an image speak to a larger issue? I was trying to figure out how do I contend with these images of lynchings? I wanted to find a new way to present and read them. I have always been haunted by Nina Simone's version of the song Strange Fruit; the way she kind of lets so many of the words linger. I remember when I was younger, having that song in my head. During that time it was still legal in the NBA to make a slam dunk and hang from the rim. It was as sign of triumph. I thought there was something interesting about these "Black bodies swinging." And how lynchings were major public spectacles of that time and sports games are major public spectacles. I thought there might be this strange connection to the Black bodies being the object in both. I was also thinking about ways to combat the image of the noose and thought, what if someone was trying to dunk on the noose.

This symbol of Black male power and triumph confronting the noose. All this imagery was in my mind and I thought there was something interesting that could be represented there.

GANDY: Tell me about your collaborative project Question Bridge?

THOMAS: The original concept came from Chris Johnson who was commissioned in 1996 to create a video piece for the Museum of Photographic Arts in San Diego, CA. He wanted to make a piece that encouraged different aspects of the African American community to communicate with one another. He saw there was a fissure between those people, who after integration were able to leave the community and have a certain kind of success and those people who were stuck in the "hood." He wanted to figure out a way to have them have a revealing conversation. He thought it might be more fruitful to have conversations mediated through video to ensure people listened more effectively. In 2006, we revised the project to focus on Black men. I realized in the construction of the Black male identity there seemed to be no virtues left. The only virtue that was left was physical and sexual prowess, if you can call them virtues. What's sad is that you can tell by the way men of my generation presented themselves they latched onto that. Obviously, there is a whole range of Black men that live outside of that. I wanted to use the Question Bridge model of Black men asking questions of other Black men to show there is just as much range within any given demographic as it is outside of it. So Chris, Bayete Ross Smith and I started to travel the country and ask Black men if they had a question for another Black man.

Hank Willis Thomas, Strange Fruit, 2011

They would ask the question, and then I had to figure out who could answer their question. The most challenging question for me was from guy who said, "What is so cool about selling crack?" How do you answer that question? Through this exchange, of a stranger asking a question of another stranger, there is not just one answer but infinite answers. The project has now grown into a campaign to represent or redefine Black male identity. As collaborators, we don't all agree about what Black identity is. But we do agree that a question is more generous than an answer because a question provides someone else with a platform for expression.

In January 2012, Question Bridge will travel to the Salt Lake Art Center, the Oakland Museum, the Brooklyn Museum, Atlanta and the Sundance Film Festival as an installation and a 9-12th grade curriculum piloted in Atlanta, Oakland and New York. For more information visit: www.questionbridge.com and www.corcoran.org/strangefruit and www.hankwillisthomas.com (Photo Credits: Courtesy of the artist and Jack Shainman Gallery, © Hank Willis Thomas)

Hank Willis Thomas

(Photo by Rashid Johnson)

Hank Willis Thomas, below, donated the photo Strange Fruit, right, to an exhibit of artwork that will be auctioned in November to benefit The Africa Foundation.

The NEW BLACK

AN ARTIST EXPLORES RACIAL IDENTITY AND STANDARDS IN AMERICA

➔ Art for Africa New York will be on display at Sotheby's New York, 1334 York Ave., beginning Nov. 12, and will conclude with an auction Nov. 17. africafoundation.org

Artist Hank Willis Thomas, whose works often focus on themes of identity, history and pop culture, is one of 40 contemporary American and African artists whose work will be displayed and auctioned during Art for Africa New York. The event, sponsored by The Africa Foundation, assists orphaned and needy children in southern and eastern Africa. A longtime supporter of the foundation, Watch! caught up with Thomas, whose works are included in the collections of the Whitney Museum of American Art in New York and the Museum of Fine Art in Houston, to talk about his creative process, inspiration and life experience. — Carrie Mackin

Watch!: Why did you choose the title of Billie Holiday's song "Strange Fruit" for the photograph that you donated?

Hank Willis Thomas: The photograph is very much about race. I recently read a book about the black body as spectacle, and it made me think about what happens to black athletes who step out of line, such as Tiger Woods or Kobe Bryant, and how there's a different standard in which black athletes are criticized in the media, opposed to, say, someone like Ben Roethlisberger. So the work is really trying to talk about the complexities of that.

Watch!: Your Branded series and monograph Pitch Blackness was a reaction to the shooting of your cousin in 2000. How did that affect your work?

Hank: It inspired me to start making work about things that really affect real people. I was interested in violence and experience as related to the black male body and commodity culture, so my cousin's murder really inspired me to explore that.

Watch!: Your background is in photography, although you do work in other mediums as well. Do you prefer one to the other?

Hank: I've started thinking of myself less as a photographer and more of a photoconceptual artist or new media artist. I want to make work that speaks about popular culture but isn't limited to just being about one medium, although I have the most fun with photography. I can retouch or remove text or objects or images as a way of retelling history.

Watch!: You've traveled to Africa over the past several years. How do you interpret race relations there, and has that influenced you?

Hank: I've been to Ghana, Angola, Senegal and South Africa, and those countries have very different relationships to race or blackness, specifically because there are so many diverse ethnicities on the continent. I feel that South Africa's relationship to race is understood the same way as it is in the U.S., due to its relatively recent relationship with apartheid, whereas in Senegal there isn't such a highly visible class of Europeans who dominated the culture and identity. My first trip to South Africa really made me realize that blackness is a cultural fabrication; when one country or countries don't agree what it means to be black, there has to be something wrong with the notion. That's when I started to question the relevance of race defined by others.

Tuesday, April 19, 2011 | By Hanifa Haris

Erasing Type: Hank Willis Thomas on What Advertisements Are Really Saying

Hank Willis Thomas

Things That Make You Go Hmmmmmm?!!

Year: 2000

Original Photographer: Unknown

Original Ad: Nissan Cars

"This was the first of the series because someone gave me this image and said I should do something with it. It became clear to me that truth is stranger than fiction and that by merely removing the text and logo from the advertisement you would never know this was an ad for a Japanese car."

Unbranded: Reflections in Black by Corporate America 1968-2008," part of a new installation at the Brooklyn Museum of Art, is a project by artist Hank Willis Thomas. Appropriating ads that have targeted the black audience over the last 40 years, Thomas uses their images to explore identity, history and popular culture.

By “unbranding” photographs—digitally removing the logos and text—Thomas allows the viewer to view the image, now stripped of its sale pitch, to take hard look at the way the advertising industry—and society at large—uses photography to reinforce generalizations about race and gender.

In an interview with TIME, Thomas shared his inspiration, process and technique:

What inspired you to start working on this project?

The Unbranded project is a response to a project of mine called B®anded [In that project, Thomas took ad copy and superimposed it over photographs, for example taking MasterCard copy and pasting over a photograph of a funeral]. There I was thinking about how black bodies were branded as a sign of ownership during slavery, and how their descendants bodies are branded today through corporate advertising. Unbranded came about when I realized that I could say more by using real ads as a form of cultural critique.

What is interesting to you about that time period?

With the murder of Martin Luther King, 1968 became the symbolic end of the Civil Rights Movement. I wanted to track “blackness” in the corporate eye during this amazing period of progress, which is book-ended by the assassinations of Robert F. Kennedy and Martin Luther King and the election of Barack Obama.

Can you tell us a bit about the provenance of the photographs you picked?

Most of the people making decisions in advertising then, and now, are white males. I was interested in how white male interpretations of “black” identity shaped aspects of African American lives. The photographers of most of these images are unknown. I feel its integral to understand that these images are essentially created by our society, and that I did not contribute to, nor claim any authorship, of them.

What sorts of advertisements were you most drawn to?

I chose two ads for every year, trying to find as broad a range of ads as possible from films, foods, clothing, cigarettes and alcohol. What I'm most interested in these ads is not only how other people see black Americans, but also how we see ourselves. Part of advertising's success is based on its ability to reinforce generalizations developed around race, gender and ethnicity which are generally false, but [these generalizations] can sometimes be entertaining, sometimes true, and sometimes horrifying.

While selecting ads and seeing the recurrence of common threads in advertisements, what did you find most intriguing?

I saw a lot ads for cigarettes, alcohol and hair care products. And themes of romance, family, and seduction and humor were common in all. I find it most intriguing that most of the ads appear to have nothing to do with the product once they are unbranded.

To view more work by Hank Willis Thomas, visit hankwillisthomas.com